Concerning Producers.

The producer, like the poet, is born, not made; at any rate it is a very difficult thing to make a producer—a producer of the type of Mansfield or Belasco. In these two latter men you have, from the theatrical standpoint, something like the ideal producer of a play. Not a single detail of a production escapes men of this type. The actors and actresses are "letter perfect"; the scenery, costumes, accessories and properties generally of the play are accurate, down to the smallest detail. This sums up in a few words the whole art of "production." The moving picture demands something like the same kind of ability. But how often is it found? Very rarely, as our pages testify week by week. Producers seem a very autocratic class. Some of them are like the Bourbon Kings of France. They have nothing to learn—at least, in their own estimation. The letter of "Wild West," however, which we print in another part of this week's World, shows that it is high time that the producer departed from his erroneous ways and went about his business in the proper fashion. That is, by correctly interpreting his author, instead of misinterpreting him at his own sweet will. "Wild West" is one of many authors who have complained to us that their moving picture plays have been accepted for production, and, when presented to the public, have been deficient or faulty in some respect which has called down adverse criticism in our own pages and others. The faults have been clearly traced to the ignorance or incapacity of the producers. This, we venture to say, is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs.

Now, who suffers by this absurd system of misproducing? First of all the author, who has the mortification of witnessing his careful work incorrectly presented to the public; secondly, the manufacturer, whose prestige is bound to be impaired by continued adverse criticism; thirdly, the moving picture exhibitor, who suffers from the disappointment of the most important factor of all, namely, the public. For the public, as we have pointed out time after time, is getting very critical in these matters and will no longer stand for moving pictures which are false to truth in any vital respect.

Besides endorsing the justice of "Wild West's" complaint, we are enabled to write from experience and observation of the ways in which some producers work. These men, trusted by their employers, don't scruple at times to violate all the unities of a play. They cut, carve, amend and alter at their sweet will, without reference to the proper sequence and development of the story. Moreover, they become indifferent to time, the proper dressing of the characters and the proper action of the piece. Their policy seems to fit a certain amount of action to a certain amount of film, totally regardless of the eternal fitness of a narrative story told on the screen. Hence, as we have just pointed out, dissatisfaction and disappointment all round. It is time that those responsible for the production of moving pictures should give attention to this point. The "perfect producer," no doubt, is hard to find. But there should, at any rate, be no difficulty in drawing upon such talent and ability as will prevent the perpetration of the glaring absurdities which occasionally disfigure American made films. We trust, that in drawing attention to this matter, we shall not be credited with any other intention than that of desiring to see the moving picture lifted above the crudities of productive error which only too frequently disfigure it.

The Musical End.

There are many things that go to the making of a successful moving picture theater. There are, of course, the pictures, the house itself, its arrangement, the way in which it is conducted, and the general administrative details. Each of these plays a large part. Due attention to each of them is necessary if success is sought. You may have a nice house, nicely administrated, but bad pictures, and the result will not be a success; or you may have good pictures badly shown in a comfortless room with unpleasant administrative details. The result will be the same as in the foregoing case. Failure or only partial success.

We have been searching these many months for our ideal moving picture house, and we have not found it yet. We have found good, bad, and indifferent. We have not found one in which to our mind, there is not room for considerable improvement under each of the heads specified in the first paragraph. But that improvement, we believe, will come in time.

At an early date we hope to take many opportunities of personally inspecting the moving picture theaters in other large cities besides New York, which, although it is the metropolis of North America, is woefully behind other cities in respect of its amusement houses. But there is one head under which nearly every moving picture theater in New York City, in our opinion, is lamentably deficient. We mean the music—the music that accompanies, illustrates, or which is supposed to harmonize with the pictures. The piano and some sound effects are usually considered sufficient; and oh, and oh, the piano and the players we sometimes hear and sometimes see! The former is more often than not out of tune, and the latter, though he can strike the keys with something like accuracy and precision, if not violence, cannot play music, or, if he can, he does not. In other words, speaking generally, the musical end of the moving picture house programme is, as a rule, so unsatisfactory that we think it our duty specially in this article to call attention to it.

We all know the old poetical lines, "That music hath charms to soothe the savage breast, etc." Good music in a moving picture house can make up for a lot of deficiency in other respects. The house may be cheerless and the pictures and the manners of showing them indifferent, the song slides bad, the singing discordant, but if there is a constant stream of good music going on, either from a small orchestra or some of the automatic instruments on the market which are especially supplied for amusement places, the audience will forgive a lot. And where all else is good, the house good, the administration good, why, if there is also agreeable and suitable music, well-played music, which symphonizes, as it were, with the pictures, it bridges the intervals and generally gratifies the ear. Then the show will create an even better and more favorable impression.

Now we ask all those responsible for the conduct of moving picture houses to pay closer attention to the musical end. Half the planists whom we have heard these last six months deserve to lose their jobs, for if they can play, they either won't or don't. The pianos should be either burnt or put into tune or replaced by better ones. But, better still, we think, is our advice, wherever practical, to engage a small orchestra of strings, with the addition of the piano and the sound effects. Of course, this costs money, but we think that the outlay would recoup itself.

Then besides the orchestra there are, in addition to the usual and somewhat tiresome piano, a number of automatic instruments which might be used for the purpose. To these we shall make reference on other occasions. The object of this present article will have been gained if it is the means of drawing the particular attention of moving picture theater exhibitors to the importance of the musical end, which, at present, is not so good as it might be. This, of course, is generalization. We know of moving picture theaters in New York City where it is a pleasure for us to sit and listen to the piano music. We have the Keith & Proctor houses in mind.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

By F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

CHAPTER IX.

FITTINGS FOR OPERATING ROOM.

Every operating room should have a small, substantial work bench, made from 2-inch lumber and equipped with a small, solid vise with anvil attachment. Repair bills may not be so heavy if you give the operator a fair show to fix things himself. But if you won't even give him a decent work bench and vise (a "work bench" made of 1-inch stuff isn't "decent") he is not very much to be blamed if he takes no great interest in trying to make repairs. Around the wall should be plenty of coat hooks or stout nails on which to hang things, and a substantial shelf should be conveniently located high enough to be out of the way. Always and invariably there must be a metal can in which to throw carbon butts and the operator who puts them anywhere else should be promptly fired, before he fires your house. It is well to locate a small shelf just under the peephole, to be used for announcement slides, oil can, cement, song slides, etc. There must, of course, be an electric fan, but its location will depend on circumstances.

TOOLS.

The best and most satisfactory plan is for the operator to own his own kit of tools. Tools furnished by the house will usually be neither complete or satisfactory. The following list contains nothing superfluous and may be added to at will, but it constitutes a fairly good kit and costs but a few dollars; in buying tools it always pays to get the best quality obtainable: One pair "Button" plyers, 8 or 10-inch; one pair 8 or 10-inch lineman's side cutting plyers (I leave the matter of size open, as some prefer one and some the other; one pair 8 or 10-inch gas plyers; one large and one medium screw driver; one screw driver with good length of carefully tempered blade for small machine screws; one 10 or 12-inch cabinet rasp for sharpening carbons; one small riveting hammer; one claw hammer; one small cold chisel; one medium size punch; one very small punch for star and cam pins; one pair small tinner's snips; one blunt nose film shears (such as clerks use); one small gasoline torch for soldering wire joints. With this kit you will be able to do almost any ordinary job, but you will have use for them all. In addition to the above the house should furnish one 8 and one 10-inch flat file, one ⅝ round file, one 8-inch "rattail" file, a small bench vise with anvil, some soldering flux, solder wire, film cement, slide cover glass, mats and binders.

Tools should be arranged neatly and conveniently on the wall, preferably over the work bench, though plyers and screw drivers should always be hung within reach of the machine. The writer has found the clamps, such as are used to fasten mental conduit to the wall, to be the neatest and best tool holders. They are very cheap and may be had in any size. Get ¾-inch ones for plyers and smaller sizes for other tools. Never, never leave tools lying around. When through with a tool put it back in its place instantly. It will take a second or two to do this, but "I had that screw driver a minute ago, now where in thunder is it?" is altogether too common a remark and it spells Sloppy Workman in big letters. Keep your tools in place and don't have to rummage all over the room every time you need something. It is cheaper by far in the long run. It is a shame, but it is a fact, so far as the observation of the writer goes—and he is frequently called to theaters to straighten things out, therefore has seen many operating rooms—that not one operating room in ten is equipped with a half-way complete set of tools and in not one in fifty are even the few tools there hung up in orderly fashion. All this means wasted energy and lessens a man's chances of Heaven (if the showman has any, anyhow) through fracturing the third commandment. I might add that it is a good plan to wrap plyer handles with insulating tape. It will save you many unpleasant shocks.

SWITCHES.

The operating room switches must be installed in compliance with local law, which, in many cities, requires a metal cabinet with a door. All switches should be assembled directly in front of the operator, as he sits in operating position, except that the dissolver switch, if one be used, may be located convenient to that machine. In wiring an operating room make the electrical connection of each machine entirely independent of every other machine. A tremendous mistake is frequently made, where two machines are used, of installing a double throw switch attaching one machine to each end. This is very bad if the machines are to be used alternately on steady run, since it is desirable many times to have both lamps burning at once. To explain: You are running one machine, but must switch over to the other when that film runs out. Now with independent wiring your helper can start the lamp of the other machine and start that machine so as to not leave the curtain dark for an instant, but with double throw switches between you must stop your machine, throw the switch, start the lamp (perhaps with new carbons) and start the other machine all while the house is standing dark. It is surprising how many good houses have their machines wired on the foolish double throw switch plan. It is to be condemned from any and every point of view. Have your operating room incandescent lights equipped with snap switch sockets, but also have a snap switch on the wall beside the peephole with which you can put them all out. If one of the auditorium light circuits is handled by the operator, as it should be, have this switch located by the side of the peephole. Keep all switch contacts clean, smoothing them up occasionally, if necessary, with a fine file. Keep the handles and crossbars of switches tight; a loose, wobbly switch is an abomination and none but a lazy, sloppy workman will tolerate it.

Keep your operating room clean. Under no circumstances allow loose papers or trash of any kind to accumulate on the floor. Make it your invariable practice to sweep the room thoroughly once each day. The operator who has not enough ambition to keep his operating room at least decently clean had better quit and go into the junk business. He can slop around all he wants to then. If he don't quit I would earnestly recommend that his pay be stopped. Keeping an operating room clean is so small a matter that there is absolutely no excuse on earth for failure to do so. When running it is necessary to have the operating room in darkness if you get the best results. With lights burning in the operating room you cannot nearly so readily distinguish shadows on the picture. It is harder on the eyes, too. The darker the room is the better. In front of the lamp house, especially if the floor be ironclad, should be an insulating mat about 24 x 30 inches in size. This may be rubber, heavy linoleum or asbestos board—not sheet asbestos, but asbestos board. But whatever it is it should be well fastened down, or let into the floor flush with its surface. The writer insists on a comfortable chair with a back. He don't propose to sit bunched up on an uncomfortable stool. He tries to give good service, as every man should, but he demands reasonable comfort in his work as, also, every man should. Of course this item don't make much difference on a short evening run, but for long runs it makes a lot.

The Making of Signs and Posters for Moving Picture Theatres.

By Wm. I. Sackheim.

CHAPTER IV.

If you have noted carefully the instructions in the preceding chapter, you should now have sufficient control over the brush to write any letter in the alphabet, providing you knew their formation or shape. This is naturally the next step.

I have endeavored to impress upon you the fact that a quick, neat and artistic style is more essential than a perfect, precise and accurate one. It will, therefore, be necessary to introduce only such types of alphabets as are simple of construction and adaptable to moving picture work.

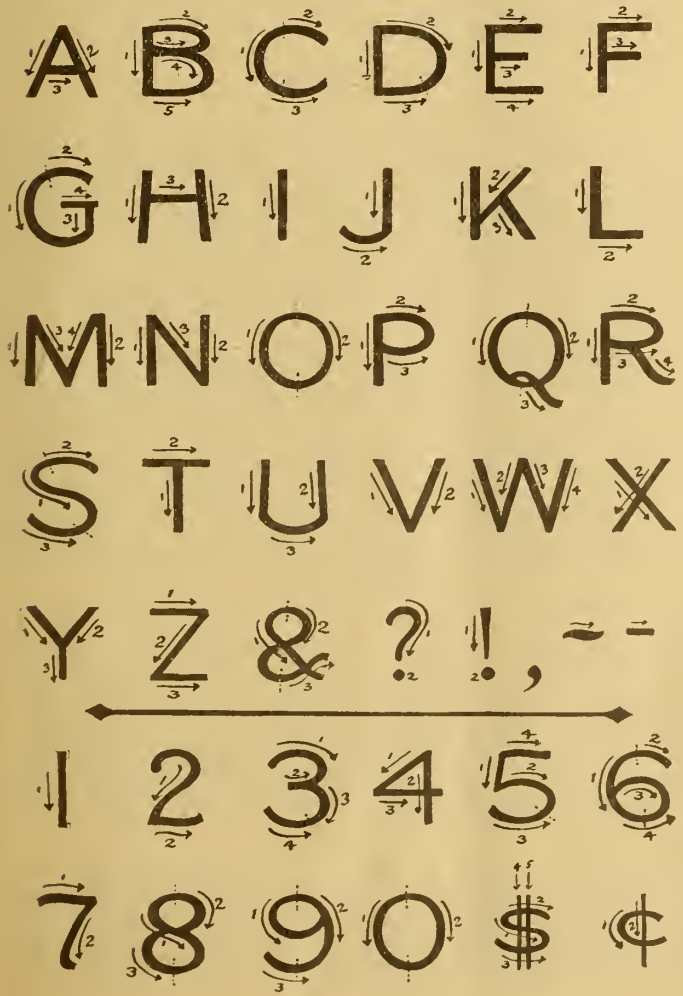
The first and the most desirable, yet simple, alphabet is

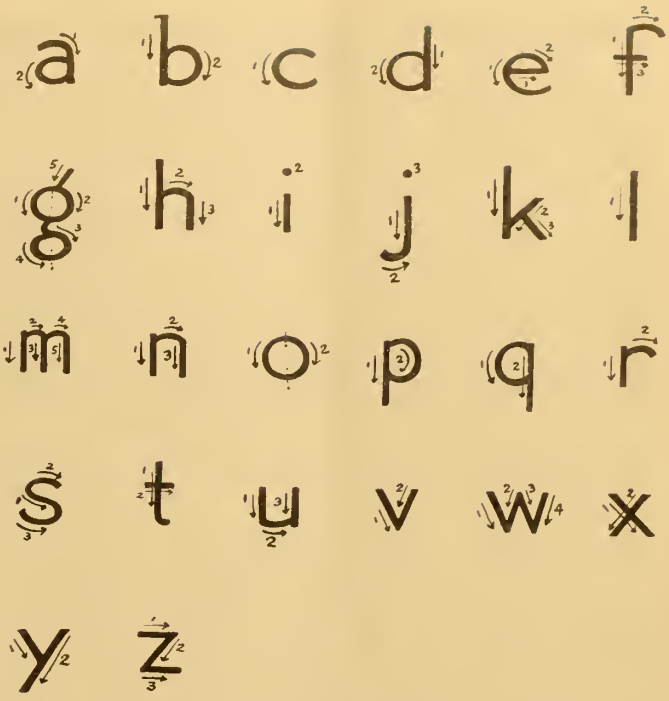
The Single Stroke Egyptian.

Before proceeding with this exercise, I would advise you to purchase several red sable pointed lettering brushes, sizes varying from No. 5 to No. 12, and practice the elementary strokes described in last week's installments with the No. 5, No. 8 and No. 11 brush, always bearing in mind that when using a large size brush always rule your lines farther apart so as to make your strokes larger. Thus in working with a No. 7 brush I advised you to rule your lines 1½ inches apart, but for a No. 11 brush they should be about 3 inches apart, while for a No. 5 brush the lines should be about 1 inch apart. This rule is not imperative, but you will find that by following this method for practice work the height of your strokes will be in proportion to their thickness.

Rule a sheet of paper as described in previous article and with a No. 7 brush copy the single stroke capitals in Fig. 3. The small number at each arrow denotes which strokes are to be made first, second, third, etc., while the arrow shows in which direction the stroke is to be made.

For instance, the left hand stroke or bar of the A is marked No. 1. Start at the top of your ruled pencil guide line and move your brush diagonally down to the left, as arrow 1 points. Next make strokes 2, 3 and 4. Follow this method through the entire alphabet.





Practice each letter until you can execute it well and until its formation is well fixed in your memory, so that you will be able to write the entire alphabet without recourse to the copy.

The Dollar ($) and Cent (c.) marks I have made the same size as the letters and numerals, but in actual sign work these marks should only be about half the size of the numerals.

After using the No. 7 brush try this alphabet with the other brushes. Always hold the brush lightly but firmly and work with the point of the brush and with a uniform pressure. This will ensure an even thickness to all your strokes.

Do not sketch the letters with a lead pencil preparatory to using the brush, or you will have difficulty in memorizing the shapes of the letters. All the work should be done off-hand. The only guide lines to be used are the pencil lines that are ruled across the sheet to determine the height of the letters.

Notes from Corning, N. Y.

Livingston & Clark have purchased Dreamland nickel theater at No. 38 West Market street of Patrick Callahan, and will run it in connection with the Bijou Theater at No. 27 East Market street. The deal was consummated yesterday Joseph Livingston is one of the most original and energetic and the new proprietors took possession to-day.
moving picture theater proprietors in the city. Several weeks ago he secured the Bijou, when it was practically "down and out." By giving the latest and best in moving pictures, securing first-class singers, etc., and introducing many innovations which met the favor of the amusement public, he has built up a splendid patronage.

Mr. Livingston says he will proceed to give Dreamland Theater patrons just as good amusement as at the Bijou, which is "enuf sed."

THE OPERATORS' UNION.

The sympathy of the Moving Picture World goes out to the operators who, to protect their own interests, have to convene at the hour when most people are going to bed and disperse at daybreak. A World representative dropped into their meeting on last Monday night and found some 150 operators in attendance. The union seems to be in a very flourishing condition.

Lynchburg, Va.—The Gaiety Theater, owned by J. B. Trent (Jas. F. Jackson, manager), opened June 14th to turn-away business, and continues to draw well despite the hot weather. High-class pictures, the latest songs, piano and traps constitute the program.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

"Say!" shouted an East Side friend of mine the other night, "haf you had any of dose flim-flammable flims yet?" I assured him that I had been served with some of the long-looked-for article and then proceeded to set him right on the matter of pronunciation. I finally got him straightened out and he is now able to say "non-inflammable" and "films." He took the corrections in good turn and explained that he got the flim-flammable term from his operator, who is supposed to be a very smart fellow. His confidence in the operator is deep-rooted and unswerving. I give in my own language some of the points he made to justify that confidence. "That operator looks after my interests as well as I look after them. He watches every picture I get and he can pick out repeaters like a crack sport at the race track can pick out winners. He knows a poor subject at sight and if any scratched films come to our place he is on the job in a minute. He is a great operator and will not allow any exchange to impose upon me. In the last four months I have changed my service five times on his recommendation."

I said nothing to my friend, but have since been thinking over the matter with intense earnestness. In getting my friend to change so frequently from one exchange to another is the operator really prompted by a spirit of good service to his employer, or is he one of the go-betweens of which there is considerable unpleasant comment?

I heard a film exchange manager say the other day that the exchanges are not getting a fair deal at the hands of some operators who have won the confidence af their employers by their skill as operators and are switching the services from the exchanges to their personal advantage.

Fidelity to a good employer is highly commendable, but if some of the reports I hear are true there is a good deal of sham fidelity and the exhibitors should occasionally exercise their own judgment, and not rely wholly and solely upon the statements and judgment of the operators. It is openly charged that the subsidizing of operators by some competing film exchanges has become so common that it is now looked upon by them as legitimate.

The licensed manufacturers have the non-inflammable film on the market at last. Although not generally used at present, owing to the supply being somewhat limited, all the subjects will soon be made of that kind of stock. Thus far no adverse criticisms regarding the new stock have been heard, nor can it be said that enthusiasm over its introduction has run to a high pitch. The explanation for this is that both renters and exhibitors are awaiting the results of practical use of the new product. Many are skeptical regarding it, but up to the present time there appears to be no justification for skepticism. The new article is apparently making good.

* * *

It is but fair to say that until the non-inflammable film comes into general use the exhibitors should be watchful and guard against experimental work by their operators. The danger attending this will be better understood when I say that the manufacturers are at present using up the stock on hand of regular film and making some subjects of the non-inflammable film. The boxes containing the latter bear printed labels stating that the subject is on non-inflammable film, but this notice is only given to the film exchanges. The exhibitors, on account of the mixed production, do not know what kind of film they are getting. Now if operators are allowed to demonstrate to their friends the length of time the light can be allowed to remain upon the non-inflammable film without danger of ignition there is a strong possibility that some operators may some time leave the light on the wrong kind of film, so to be on the safe side experiments should be cut out until such time as the new film is generally used. With all the enforced safeguards now in use it is not likely that any very serious result would follow if the regular film should be mistaken for the new kind by an experimenting operator, but as experiments are not required in exhibiting places and in no way (in this particular at least) have a direct bearing upon the show itself they should be tabooed.

The advent of the non-inflammable film has again stirred up discussion as to what bearing it will have upon the picture machines and their makers. Some time must elapse before there will be any observable bearing. It is quite certain that none of the existing laws requiring flame shields, magazines, automatic shutters, etc., will be rescinded or abridged for some time. I have been informed that the authorities will not entertain any suggestions in that direction until they become thoroughly convinced by practical use that the new film is all that is claimed for it. From another quarter I learn that some authorities will oppose any change in existing conditions regardless of the tests the new film may withstand on the ground that there cannot be too many safeguards in places of amusement. No doubt many of the makers of machines will take the same view and the dream enjoyed by some that they will soon be relieved of the handling of so many safety devices may be a prolonged dream.

The spell of hot weather that has prevailed recently has played havoc with the receipts of picture places. Exhibitors all over the country report big drops. Even the aircdomes have failed to draw audiences large enough to even meet expenses and many places have suspended for the balance of the Summer season, or until such time as the weather shows a disposition to assume a modcrated condition that will remove from the minds of the patrons the terrors of sweltering. The greatest surprise is that the open air places could not hold the people. This is the first season they have failed to do so, but we have had some awful hot weather, old Sol has been so relentless that you couldn't get an audience into any enclosed place to see a show, even if it were a cold storage plant. Many exhibitors who pounced upon vacant plots and invested a considerable amount of good coin in clinching leases and fitting up the places have lost heavily thus far and the reports from the seaside resorts have been very discouraging. People who still cling to enclosed places in the cities and large towns have adopted radical measures in the curtailment of expenses. Vaudeville acts are cut out and wherever it is possible to do so illustrated song singers and even ushers are being dispensed with. The number of shows are also being reduced to save on film rentals. Many places that were operated every afternoon and evening are now only running two or three nights a week. The proprietors are sailing close, being content to take in enough to pay ordinary expenses of holding their places until after in middle of August. The small capital man has a trying time of it just now, especially the one who depends on the receipts for living expenses. In spite of all this, however, none of the exhibitors are disposed to leave the business. All express the greatest faith in the outcome of the next Fall and Winter season. The pictures will make good after old Sol gets through sizzling.

THE SONGS.

More new songs have been offered the past week than for some time and the quality, as a whole, has been better. Some of the new ones have been better than usual, while others, as might be expected, have fallen below the standard. It must be said, however, in relation to some of the new ones that they have been made by the illustrations.

The illustrations have been of a superior quality. The leading illustrators are doing better work constantly; the quality of the slides turned out now are far ahead of those made six months ago.

The singers seem to be doing better, though of course it is difficult in this respect to make comparisons. In only two of the important theaters of the city have the same singers remained throughout the past six months, but they are doing better than in the Winter. And their work is very satisfactory. As singers of lively and rollicking songs they have always been successful, and they are adding to their reputations daily. Some of the songs sung by them have been encored again and again.

Such songs, such singers and such illustrations add to the strength of the programme and where they are made such important features of the programmes it is well to maintain them at the present high standard.

The Kalem Company have in preparation a thrilling war story, "The Escape from Andersonville." This is a historically accurate rendering of an actual occurrence during the Civil War and should be in great demand. We have seen portions of the film in course of preparation and can commend the photographic quality as well as the well managed and realistic scenes of the tunneling under the prison walls, the escape of the soldiers, and the flight for life on an old-fashioned locomotive.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

In one of the plays of George Colman, a dramatist who lived and worked two or three hundred years ago, there is the following stage direction: "Lean up against the wall and grow generous." Consider what the actor was required to do. The part he was playing was an unsympathetic one, and it was demanded of him that he should show in his face, without speaking, the transition from a mood of harshness to one of generosity. In other words, he had to entirely revolutionize his feelings and to convey the process of the transition and its achievement to the audience. Rather a difficult thing for an actor to do.

Anybody who studies the best moving pictures of the time must realize that what the actors and actresses have got to do, if the film is to be a great success, is to work on lines indicated by that exacting author, Colman. In other words, they have to perceptibly think and let the audience see what they are thinking. That speech which the Chinese say is given us to hide our thoughts is denied them. The acting process with them, therefore, is entirely a mental one.

* * *

The other afternoon when I sat in my accustomed seat at the Bijou Dream, on Fourteenth street, and the title of the Biograph subject, "The Way of Man," appeared on the screen, there was a sudden hush in the house and people leaned forward expectantly. A lady immediately in front of me settled herself deliberately in her seat, and a man on my left, who had been interjecting criticisms on the pictures all the afternoon, muttered to himself, "Now we shall see something good." I sat quite near the young lady who was playing the piano, as she always does so very brilliantly, and I looked around at the crowded house and I saw interest and expectancy in every face.

Well, the picture started. The plot was unfolded and developed. "Why," said the man at my left, "you can see them thinking." This man unconsciously voiced the feeling of the entire house. We saw the three leading characters thinking. We were unconscious of aught else. The photography of the picture, the dressing, the accessories, the other characters, all these were lost to us, for we had before us a very beautiful human spectacle of a conflict between love and duty, in which one man and two girls were playing and thinking their respective parts before us.

Now this picture held the attention of the audience right up to the very last foot of film, because the Biograph Company have got down to the root idea of a moving picture and are week by week presenting it to the minds of audiences all over the United States, if not the world. Their photographs are not mere snap shots, or rapidly taken groups of small parties of puppets moving about on the stage. No. They are actual photographs of thinking men and women and, therefore, they have a pscyhological as well as a photographic interest. In an ordinary stage play, it is as a rule not so much the dialogue, not so much the main action which lingers in the mind as some critical moment of thought upon which the progress of the play may hinge. Take for example Shakespeare's play of "Macbeth" and the scene where Macbeth learns of his wife's death. You all know the remark, "She should have died hereafter." Just look at the face of the actor, be he an Irving, a Tree, or a Mansfield, who plays the part. Look at his face immediately after he has uttered those momentous words and you will realize the intense sorrow and disappointment and bitterness which has passed through his mind.

* * *

Now, equally tragic are the conflicting emotions shown by the Biograph leading man and the two girls in last Monday's release of "The Way of Man." You see the man thinking to himself: "Shall I throw the disfigured girl over for the pretty cousin? Is it right? Is it loyal? What shall I do?" And then the disfigured girl is thinking: "Will that scar rob me of that man's love? Does he prefer the unscarred girl to me? What will he do?" Finally there is the detrimental cousin. She has the opportunity. All is fair in love and war. Why does she not take advantage of this man's preference for her?

So, for many minutes this little three-cornered problem works itself out on the screen to the intense interest of an attentive autdience. I think the Biograph producing staff and their players are deserving of the very highest commendation for the absorbing hold which their pictures now have upon the American public. A Biograph comedy is as much an institution as Miss Maude Adams at the Empire, on Broadway. People all over the city are as familiar with the trend of Biograph pictures as they are with that of a Belasco masterpiece. They worship that silent Biograph heroine, and they know that the handsome leading man will always give good acting. For the famous Biograph Stock Company think out their work and don't walk through it.

* * *

Now all this, I think, is indicative of progress in the making of moving pictures in which other manufacturers as well as the Biograph Company prominently shine. It is as clear as day that all the other manufacturers will also have to advance. In other words, "quality" is telling. Pretty scenery, pretty dresses, a good play, perfect photography, all this combined in a short while from now will fail to make the moving picture popular, unless the actors and actresses act. And this is what the Biograph Company does. And then the photographer does his work to perfection. He puts his camera near the subjects and the lens, and you see what is passing in the minds of the actors and actresses. The total combination is that you get as perfect a picture play from the Biograph studio as it is possible in the present stage of moving picture making to get.

So, ladies and gentlemen of Fourteenth street, your "Lux Graphicus" takes his hat off to you and congratulates you on your excellent work. That work he hears from exhibitors and audiences alike is immensely appreciated; and it deserves to be. It is not slobbed over, it is conscientiously carried out. It is probably no exaggeration to say that if the more wealthy classes of this city were aware of the fine dramatic stuff which the Biograph Company is making, a moving picture theater de luxe, on upper Broadway, between Forty-second and Fifty-ninth streets, would become a permanent feature of the theatrical world.

THE N. I. FILM.

The non-inflammable film stock is now being issued by so many manufacturers that we again call attention to the necessity of exhibitors supplying themselves with N. I. cement. As we pointed out before, this cement will also make joints in the old stock, but no other cement will do for the N. I. stock. The N. I. cement is put up in bottles retailing at 25 cents and can be procured from the exchanges.

SPECIAL FILM DESIRED.

A World reader asks us to put him in communication with anyone who is prepared to make an endless film of any desired width or length. Replies to be addressed to Endless, care of Moving Picture World.

CARL LAEMMLE.

Mr. Laemmle dropped into our offices for a few minutes' chat this week and intimated that in a short time New York City would see what a real film exchange looked like. He has already selected his location, but is not yet ready to make it public. Asked as to how his manufacturing prospects were progressing, he said that everything was going along smoothly. He was getting the best talent that was obtainable and would soon issue films that would command the trade of the world. He said that he was prepared to spend $50,000 to carry out his ideas and would not publish a single film until it was technically and artistically beyond criticism. He said he had carefully figured out his prospects and did not expect to make any profit for six months. By that time, he said, the "Imp" films would have made a name for themselves and he would reap the benefits.

A CENSORSHIP NEEDED IN ENGLAND?

A correspondent writes to "The Kinematograph" (London): I notice you ask showmen to patronise English films. I am perfectly sure we should all be pleased to do so, but look at the trash that is produced, the bad acting, bad staging, and the general self-consciousness of the average person included in the cast. I was in a renter's the other day, and he asked me to look at some new films; there were 6,000 feet, all rubbish of the crudest sort. Now, had all this time and energy been concentrated on one subject, with proper actors and artistic scenery, and an eye to detail, something worthy might have been accomplished. Could you suggest to English makers that drunkenness is not the sole form of mirth.

Comments on the Week's Films.

A WESTERN HERO (Pathe).

If our conjecture is correct, this is the first, or one of the first, Wild West moving picture photographs made by Messrs. Pathe. They have gone right into the current game as it is being played by so many moving picture makers: that is they have chosen a Western subject for camera treatment. To begin with, the picture is beautifully colored, indeed, so far as we may judge, the different colors are so natural and lifelike that even the long threatened photography in natural colors could hardly displace the Pathe method, as it is at present practiced by this eminent firm. The full story of the film, which was given in last week's issue, shows some extremely good acting cast around a series of adventures in which the duplicity and cunning of American aboriginals forms the main theme. Of course, the Indians are defeated in their duplicity and everybody is made happy at the end of the picture. There appears, from inquiries that we have made, to be a very great demand amongst American audiences for Indian subjects, probably, therefore, on that account, this Pathe subject will be popular. It is a radical departure from the usual Pathe picture, and will, no doubt, be well appreciated out West, where fine comedy and tense drama of the European kind is hardly understood or appreciated yet awhile.

THE OYSTERMAN'S GOLD (Lubin).

Mr. Lubin has produced a film which ends in a way totally unanticipated, we venture to think, by 99 per cent. of the audience who witness it. It starts off in a manner somewhat prosaic, although decidedly interesting. It shows in a series of scenes the process of oyster catching. We see the men at work on the boat, and the landing of the molluscs. Incidentally there is a view of an oyster dredging fleet, and finally we reach that point where the catch of oysters is sold to an oyster merchant on the shore. We had just persuaded ourselves that Mr. Lubin had contented himself with the making of an industrial picture of an informative character when the drama started. And a very fine drama it is. The oysterman having disposed of his catch, pockets his gold, but wharf rats are on the watch and they track him home with the view of robbing him. So home he goes, along a very beautiful rocky shore, lashed by the ocean which has given the Lubin operators the opportunity of making some extremely good photographs of seashore scenery. Indeed, in this respect alone, the picture is well worth looking at. Well, the two wharf rats kill their man and one of them is also killed, leaving the sole survivor in possession of his ill-gotten gold. Now comes the tragic part of this very interesting story. The culprit seeks to hide his gold, when the apparition of the murdered oysterman appears to him. So he goes from scene to scene. So long as the cursed gold is on him, so long as he endeavors to hide it, so often does the vision of the murdered oysterman haunt him. This part of the picture is very effectively managed—the printing in of the supplementary image being neatly done. Finally, of course, the owner of the stolen gold commits suicide. The acting in the piece is fairly good, and, as we have said at the outset, it is a curious contrast in utilitarianism and weird tragedy. The audience appeared to receive it with great favor. There is a bad technical defect running throughout the film that should have been remedied by physical treatment, or else that portion of the negative made over again.

THE WAY OF MAN (Biograph).

This is the nearest approach to a problem play which the Biograph dramatic staff have yet taken up. Here is the problem: Given a man in love with a beautiful girl, and the girl loses her beauty through an accident, is that man bound in honor to marry her and remain true to her through life? The Biograph people don't put the problem so tersely as we do, but that is what it means all the same. Life itself is nothing but a series of problems from day to day which we have to solve for ourselves. Well, let us see how the Biograph people work out this very interesting problem. A young fellow in love with a pretty girl goes away to make his fortune. He makes that fortune. If the Biograph Company would allow us to say so, he makes that fortune unusually quickly, for he comes back quite unaltered in appearance, while the pretty girl does not appear a day older, since the fortune making process began. If our friends on Fourteenth street would tell us where fortunes are made with such rapidity, we will quit newspaper work and go and pile up the "dough" to lay at the feet of that pretty Biograph girl. But to be serious; the lover on his return finds that things are not as he left them. The girl has a pretty cousin staying with her, while she herself has been the victim of a lamp accident, which has marred her beauty. For a time she conceals the scar from her lover, and he, poor fellow, wants to be loyal to her, but it is obvious that the unscarred beauty of the cousin is influencing his heart. The man in him asserts itself to the detriment of the lover. Few of us, we imagine, could be loyal to a disfigured idol. In a very tender scene, the disfigured girl, realizing the state of affairs, places the hand of her cousin in that of the man's and goes away presumably to commit suicide. She is followed by the household, who discover her clothes at the top of a steep river bank. But she does not commit suicide, and the lover marries the cousin, and the disfigured girl becomes happy amidst different surroundings. So the pretty little piece ends in a common sense if unromantic way. Of course, there are other ways of treating this problem. One is obvious. The pretty cousin could have been made disloyal and the disfigured girl loyal, and the man's heart given to loyalty rather than to mere superficial beauty. But we were not the authors of this book, the story of which seemed to please the audience. As usual the photography of the subject was excellent, although the lighting was somewhat harsher than is usual with Biograph subjects—too much illumination seeming to come from the roof, and then the particular positive we saw was not so free of light splashes as we are accustomed to see in Biograph films. The famous Biograph heroine suffered patiently under her temporary disfigurement, and the leading man gave us a nice piece of acting as the puzzled lover. Altogether a very excellent Biograph comedy subject which fortunately did not end in tragedy.

NO APPETITE FOR DINNER (Gaumont).

Mr. Kleine is passing from success to success in his Gaumont releases. The theme of this typical bit of French comedy is a very slender one, nevertheless an attractive one. It is characteristic of French comedy on the talking stage that it is slender and graceful in outline rather than cumbrous and massive. The themes as a rule require delicate treatment. They are worked out in a thoroughly French manner; that is, by the pure gesture of acting. For French people act intuitively; that is, without an effort. In this picture a young couple inadvertently invite a soldier to dinner. They ask him to come, out of politeness, because they do not mean him to come, nor does he mean to go, but remembering the appointment he goes, after the couple have dined. So they prepare a second meal. He is hungry and they are not. Thus the picture offers an opportunity for the display of some delightful by-play. Frankly, we fear the story is rather beyond the comprehension of an average American moving picture audience, but it is a very excellent one all the same. All ends happily by mutual confession. In parts of the picture we were immensely pleased with some beautiful photographic effects obtained by using the camera in an ordinary room, taking the view through an open doorway of an adjoining apartment. This gives an opportunity for the production of very fine effects of light and shade; in fact, imparts depth and distance to the picture. Admirers of fine French comedy will find this film very much to their taste. Gaumont subjects, we are pleased to notice in recent months, have departed from the tragic and the morbid. They all end happily. We think Mr. Kleine is to be congratulated upon having command of a line of subjects which, as we have before remarked, keeps him abreast of his competitors in the American moving picture market.

GEORGE WASHINGTON UNDER THE BRITISH FLAG (Vitagraph).

The career of "The Father of His Country" will always be popular reading with patriotic Americans, and if appearances count for anything, those who frequent moving picture theaters (and they are counted by millions) will never tire of studying the life of Washington in graphic form. In this picture the Vitagraph Company with timely enterprise—and we wish to congratulate this company on the appropriateness with which it produces many of its splendid pictures—have chosen that period of Washington's career which was passed in the service of the British Government for illustration. Starting with his surveying work in Virginia, a very pretty piece of picture-making, by the way, Washington's early military experiences are illustrated in a number of disconnected scenes, each, as it were, complete in itself. The movements of the troops and officers employed in these scenes were very well rehearsed and great realism indeed was imparted to an ambuscade of Indians where death was dealt out to the unsuspecting whites. Probably patriotic Americans will care less for this picture than for that which follows it, wherein Washington is shown serving under the flag of that country which he made free. But, patriotism apart, all unite in appreciating the almost idyllic beauty of the latter part of the film which we are noticing. For it shows Colonel Washington in love. He meets the charming widow who subsequently becomes his wife. We see him as the courtier, the love dalliant, and finally as the proud bridegroom leading his pretty wife to the altar and finally being driven away with her in his carriage to the plaudits and congratulations of the guests. Effective and stirring as were the early parts of this film, these must, we think, yield the palm for tenderness of beauty and sentiment to that which shows the gallant young Colonel in the role of lover and bridegroom. These scenes are very beautifully staged indeed, and well photographed, and we think they would linger in the mind of the average person longer than the impression of military exploits. We think the Vitagraph Company is heartily deserving of praise for the splendid qualities of this picture. It is nicely colored and in parts full of the most exquisite photographic delicacy. As a feature film it will undoubtedly be popular with holiday audiences, for it cost a great amount of time and money to produce and well sustains the Vitagraph reputation for lavishness and splendor of production.

"The Whole World Kin" and "An Affair of Art," two subjects on one reel by the Edison Company, which bring us in a few moments from the sublime to the ridiculous. That "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin," is well exemplified in the very real and well-acted story which constitutes the first half of this reel. It was well received by the spectators and deserves praise and encouragement as being the kind of picture that will raise the picture show in public estimation. But what a jolt is received in the second half of the reel, so different from the character of the productions from the Edison studio that it is evident that a cog must have slipped somewhere. It should have been named "A Travesty in the Name of Art," or, better still, it should have been shelved. Even the idea, which is a very weak attempt at comedy, is not original. The passing out of such a film confirms our remarks elsewhere that a man is needed on the Censorship Board who is qualified to pass on the technical and the artistic qualities of the films in the interest of the manufacturers.

"The Peach-Basket Hat" and "The Mexican Sweethearts" is a double subject Biograph reel that calls for almost the same criticism as the Edison reel above referred to. While there is nothing new in the main feature of the plot of the first subject, the presentation is so cleverly managed and everything appears so real that it proved to be comedy of the kind that wins applause even on a hot evening. As it is next to impossible for the crop of new plots and ideas to keep up with the demand, and the future of the business is threatened by this drought, it is very encouraging indeed to see a company of such prominence as the Biograph pick up the thread of an old idea and weave out of it a clever story with all the ginger, snap and attractiveness of any of their best original sketches. It pleased the audience on this sultry evening, but "The Mexican Sweethearts" did not. The highly select American audience at Keith's did not seem to take the least interest or pleasure in witnessing the amorous actions of the Mexican couple, while they very generally expressed their disapproval of the evident slur to the bravery of an American soldier.

"Mrs. Simpson's Attractiveness."—An Eclipse film which may possess some point for foreign audiences, but is scarcely the right thing to show here. It borders upon the suggestive, not to say the coarse, and is hardly suitable for a program made up for the promiscuous audiences which visit the American motion picture theater. There are plenty of amusing subjects without resorting to anything as suggestive as this.

"The Grandfather."—The Pathes have issued several films based upon episodes in the Franco-Prussian war which have charged the Prussian soldier with being unnecessarily brutal and have represented the French as long-suffering. This one is another in which the Prussian soldier is more than ordinarily brutal, but in this instance the prowess of the French is represented as more than a match for the platoon of soldiers who amuse themselves by murdering a boy and brutally treating his aged grandfather. Perhaps the worst, at least the most disagreeable, feature about the picture is the number of deaths, which seem out of all proportion to the necessities of the story. Even though this film is made with all the niceties of quality for which the Pathe product are justly famous, the lesson taught is insufficient to warrant so much death and gloom. Surely French history includes enough interesting and more elevating episodes so that anything like this is not required.

"The Sentimental Burglar."—A Pathe film which illustrates with a good deal of plainness the methods used by burglars to enter houses and open receptacles for valuables. In this instance a little child, something like one the burglar has at home, enters and actually prevents a crime because it arouses a sentiment in the mind of the would-be robber that deters him from committing the deed. This is a dramatic touch which is not new, but is always interesting. In fact, it may be said that almost without exception any film which illustrates what a child does is instantly popular. This one, even though the subject is gloomy and arouses unpleasant suggestions, is no exception. The interest is intensified as soon as the child appears and is maintained to the end, when the attempted burglar seizes his own baby from the crib and kisses her over and over again.

"Famine in the Forest."—A Kalem picture which uses the dramatic possibilities of a famine among the Indians to good advantage and produces a picture which holds close attention from the opening to the close. The dramatic thrills begin with the capture of the trapper and the illustration of Indian cruelty which stakes him out helpless, with his lips almost touching the water in the river, where, if left to his fate, he will die of thirst. . . It is a subject that appeals to both young and old and is both interesting and educating. The few minor defects are only noticeable to the critical eye. If the famine had occurred in the dead of Winter instead of when everything was in bloom it would have seemed more natural. From the makeup of the Indian it would seem that the events occurred when they were in the most savage state, wearing only the breech-clout, but at that time wild animals were plentiful in the forest and the Indian was then more capable of caring for himself than the white man was for him. It is true, he had only one intsrument, the bow and arrow, but with that and his natural skill, every day was Christmas to him. It is unnatural that they would have hung around the tepee and starved. They were too good hunters for that. They would have died hunting and not sat waiting for their enemies to bring them food. They do that at this day and time because they are compelled to stay on the reservations. There were a few things in the makeup which showed that the property man was not well versed in Indian lore, otherwise the picture was good and a great credit to the Kalem Company. Just a little more accuracy needed, that's all, to make it perfect.

"Never Again."—A Kalem comedy which illustrates how one masher met his match, and the woman got her heavy suit case carried. His reward at the end, a nickel, prompted him to make the vow which forms the title of the film. It is a short, clever bit of satire that unfailingly brings a hearty laugh.

"An Assortment of Aeroplanes."—A Pathe picture which illustrates very graphically the different types of aeroplanes with which different makers have experimented. These are shown at rest and in operation and the technical quality of the films makes the appearance of the machines very plain and undoubtedly gives the audience which sees them a good understanding of how they look and operate. An educative film like this does a great deal of good and is to be commended. It gives a better appreciation than an engraving because the machines are seen in motion, and no flight of imagination can conceive how these machines look moving unless they have either been seen or have been reproduced like this before one. This film is entitled to consideration by everyone who wants to know more about the present status of flying.

"A Country Girl's Peril."—A picture from the Selig studio which contains a moral lesson, along with some good dramatic development and good acting. It is a re-statement of the same old story of a country girl's infatuation for a city man and the arrival at the verge of destruction before she is made aware, or believes in her danger. This story has been told many times before, but it is perennial and is always interesting, though perhaps life must be put into it to retain the interest at the full strength. The most that can be said in favor of this is that it undoubtedly illustrates a phase of life which is much too accurate to be comfortable and which leaves in the mind of those who see it a lingering doubt as to the standards of morality which seem to be now in control. In the main the story is well told, and the dramatic climax, when the girl realizes how she has been deceived and her former lover appears and tumbles the villain onto the floor of the car and orders the frightened chauffeur to drive the other way, is thrilling enough to satisfy the most enthusiastic lover of melodrama. Technically the film is good and the general presentation of the picture is quite pleasing.

"Joan of Arc."—A Pathe film d'art which has most of the well known characteristics of the Pathe product of this type, yet seems to lack in some particulars the usual convincing qualities which generally form a conspicuous feature of these ambitious pictures. The acting of the principal character, Joan of Arc, is not as strong as it ought to be in places, though perhaps this would not appeal to everyone in the same way. She is good where she hears the supernatural voice and sees the vision which calls her to the defense of her country, but in her action as commander of the army and when leading her men forward she lacks the convincing dash which should go with that place. Possibly this is because she is a woman, yet one would rather expect that a woman thought capable of commanding an army would be possessed of enough of the commanding spirit to insure the commanding attitude. The staging seems to be reasonably good, yet in places the canvas is crowded far more than Pathe is wont to crowd his canvases of this type. Perhaps the subject requires it, yet the same house has presented similar scenes with a broader canvas and in a more convincing way. The marching men seem to be supernumeraries rather than actual soldiers, and only in the battle scene does this collection of soldiers rise to the occasion and appear as though actually fighting. The capture of Joan seems rather poorly managed. It looks as though she rode deliberately down to the enemy and invited them to capture her and the fact that no effort was made to effect her release seems to give color to this supposition. The closing scenes, Joan in prison condemned to the stake and the funeral pyre, with the flames and smoke curling about her are good and seem to be more in accord with what would naturally be expected than any one of the others.

"The Old Organ."—A drama from the Vitagraph studio which possesses a strong heart interest and develops some features of strength as it goes along, yet has the disadvantage of opening with a death. The gloom which characterizes the film at the opening never leaves it. When John leaves the homestead and seeks the gold fields there is the sorrow of parting. Then comes the explosion which destroys his sight and leaves him a blind wanderer, begging his bread from sympathetic passers. Finally he hears the strains of the old organ and is welcomed home hopelessly blind. As has been pointed out many times before, such scenes are far too common. Yet, when preparing something which is supposed to be for amusement, why is it necessary to reproduce these atmospheres of gloom and sorrow? Isn't it worth while to try, at least, to create an impression of hopefulness, if not of joy, and surely that can't be done with such gloomy pictures as this. No fault can be found with the acting. It is good enough for the subject. The staging seems to be adequate. The technical quality of the film is satisfactory, with a few exceptions.

"Stung By a Bee."—A Gaumont representing the imaginary condition of a gentleman stung by a bee upon the nose, which swelled to such a tremendous size that it caused him much difficulty. The curing of the trouble by exploding a dynamite cartridge in it is a unique conception which is, perhaps, the most interesting feature of the film.
where the lighting is too harsh.

"Troubles of an Amateur Detective."—A Vitagraph comedy which illustrates in an exaggerated form the difficulties which might beset a tin badge detective who attempts to do work of that character. The one here represented probably made no more mistakes than any similar one would if put in the same positions. The exaggeration is what makes the fun and the picture has a good deal of fun in it. The audience thoroughly enjoys the discomfiture of the detective each time his mistakes are disclosed.

"Winning a Princess."—An Eclipse film which tells a pretty story that while it has its disagreeable portions ends well, which perhaps is sufficient compensation for the temporary diversion which seems to have befallen the hero. The opportunity for acting in a film of this type is not of sufficient importance to justify its existence from the dramatic standpoint. But the story is one of the hero tales with which all literature abounds, and this is enough to give interest to the film. It is a cold-blooded person, indeed, who takes no interest in these hero tales, and when the hero is deprived of his rights, whatever they may be, by some usurper, then the story acquires added interest. And eventually when he is reinstated in his own the pleasure of the audience is often boundless. The scenic portion of this film could scarcely be improved. The quality is beyond criticism, and when the picture requires mountainous scenery the selections have been made with care.

"A Paying Business."—A Gaumont comedy in which the value of tickling the vanity of the people is illustrated. An attractive scheme for coaxing money from the pockets of passers is shown. Perhaps unsuccessful beggars in this country might take heed and do likewise.

Notable Film of the Week.

THE MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY (Edison).

When writing on former occasions of the Edison films we have pointedly avowed that our qualified appreciation of the work that comes out of the famous Bronx Park studio was, to our mind, only symtomatic of what was to come; in other words, good as that work had been, we expected better. It pleases us to say that we have not been disappointed. Our expectations have met an early realization. "The Man Without a Country" is, without doubt or cavil, the finest Edison picture sent out for months past and deserves to take rank on its own merit as the notable film of the present week. Its reception by the audience, of whom we formed one on Tuesday last, was favorable in the extreme. We congratulate the Edison Company's staff on having achieved a splendid success.

Doctor Edward Everett Hale, who died the other day was a prolific writer, but never wrote a more truly pathetic story that "The Man Without a Country" upon which this Edison film is avowedly based. For in that story the hero, if we may so call him, like Dreyfus, the French military officer, unjustly loses everything in the world except life, and after all conquers and triumphs. The adaptation of popular novels to moving picture purposes is, as we have remarked before, a very difficult thing to carry out. For to be successful both the atmosphere and the sentiment of the novel must be preserved. You must make your audience feel as they look at the pictures, just as they would feel when quietly reading the book. You must, in fine, involve them in the same imaginary environment. It seems to us that the Edison producers have come splendidly out of a very trying ordeal, for they have preserved the main thread of this absorbing story; they tell it clearly and distinctly and they lead up to its tragic denouement with a fine eye to fitness of effect. For what better death could a man have than that with his country's flag in his hand?

Surely no more effective story was ever told than this. Falsely accused of having disclosed his country's naval secrets, a young officer is unjustly condemned by court marshal to deprivation of home, country and flag. He is personally degraded by his superiors, then turned adrift. In scene after scene he is spurned and scorned as a traitor, and even when he saves an American sailor from assassination and puts to sea on a ship to fight the enemy he is mercilessly turned down by those who discover his identity. But he triumphs in the very hour of death. The flag has been carried away by a shot from the masthead. Up goes our unfortunate hero with a new flag, triumphantly places it in position, and as he sees its folds proudly unfurled a bullet finds its billet and he falls dead to the deck, where his body is reverently covered up. His country has unjustly ruined him and he has a magnificent revenge, for he dies in defense of that country.

The Edison Company tell this story in a series of highly dramatic scenes full of action and decision of movement. There is not a pause throughout the entire picture. From the very moment when a spy and a traitor steal the naval plans in the absence of the young officer, upon whom suspicion is thus cast, every moment in the piece is finely dramatic. At the court martial his rage at the injustice of his service finds vent in an attack on the flag itself. In subsequent scenes, where his former superior officers discover his identity and publicly denounce him as a traitor, degrading him in the eyes of men, women and children, there are some fine moments of acting. The piece is exceedingly well acted throughout. Indeed, in this respect the acting strikes us as being quite natural and well restrained. Under this head, that of the acting side, the Edison Company have sent out a conspicuously fine picture, the finest, indeed, that they have produced this year. In fact, it is a tremendous advance on their work of two or three months ago. So great, in fact, that if this standard of quality is kept up, then the contest for pride of place amongst American film manufacturers must become exceedingly exciting.

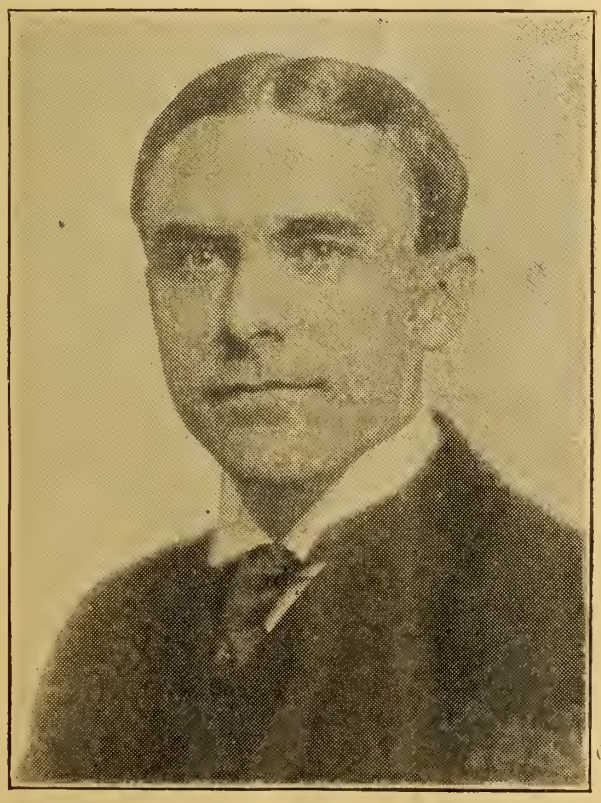
The photography of this fine picture—which shows, by the way, with great vividness the carnage of a naval battle—has been carried out with great skill and attention to the finer details of positive making. The negative has been well exposed, the positive made from it carefully printed, developed and tinted. In this latter respect the improvement is very marked indeed. Certainly the prize amongst the past week's releases belongs to the Edison Company for "The Man Without a Country." It deeply moved the audience who saw it when we did, and we have no doubt it will always be as well received.

Forrest, Ill.—John Drennan, of Fairmont, is planning to open a new moving picture theater here, in the Ulbright Building.

THE THEATRE FILM SERVICE.

Among successful film renters, Fred Aiken, of Chicago, takes a place of exceptional prominence. The career of the Theater Film Service and Amusement Supply House is unique in the history of motion pictures. Six years ago, in October, 1903, was the birthday of the Amusement Supply house in a little room on the seventh floor of the Chemical Bank Building—the same building where the Theater Film Service and the Amusement Supply House now occupy a magnificent suite of offices on the first floor. At this early date the idea of the 5-cent theater wasn't even born and the motion pictures were a night-stand attraction for the opera houses throughout the country. The exhibitor bought his film outright and paid a good price for it, too. When worn, the castoff films were greedily accepted by the fair and carnival fakirs for half price or less, depending upon condition. It was a good, live business then and many an enterprising exhibitor and now prominent dealer made their little pile.

The Amusement Supply House was a success from the very start. Fred Aiken and his co-operators saw the possibilities in systematic davertising and from now on we have seen the familiar, weird-looking projecting machine of that early date and a few lines about the gold mine in motion pictures in hundreds of magazines over and over again. Thousands and thousands of dollars of judicious advertising bringing hundreds of thousands of dollars in return. The Amusement Supply House was a mail order house of first rank and from the small Chicago office hundreds of Optigraphs, Motiographs and other "'graphs" were sent from coast to coast, and there is hardly a spot on the map of the old U. S. A. with which this enterprising firm hasn't been in more or less lively correspondence. The writer of this little article knows from experience what it means to be a "victim" on the mailing list of the Amusement Supply House. Some years ago, even before the Moving Picture World was born, just out of curiosity we dropped a line to the Amusement Supply House to get wise to this new game of money making. The gentle inquiry of the writer was promptly responded to and for the coming two years, if not every week at least every month, there were circulars and circular letters and personal letters and all kinds of letters emphasizing in the most decisive manner what tremendous opportunities were lost every day by not taking advantage of the dollars to pick up in the exhibition of motion pictures. That the writer finally succumbed and fell a victim to the lure of the silent stage and at last became a fiend of the motion pictures, is largely due to the Amusement Supply House, for which we feel happy and grateful ever since. But that is another story. In 1905 the business grew too large for the little office on the seventh floor and there were considerable changes made oll over including a large, comfortable suite of offices on the fourth floor of the same building. A new feature was introduced in the business with the development of the 5-cent theater—the renting of motion picture films. The possibilities of the film renting were early recognized by Mr. Aiken and it had been a long time a pet idea of his, though if he wasn't exactly the first man to rent films in Chicago, he certainly was one of the pioneers, and one that maybe made bigger success of this complicated and hard-handled proposition than any other man in the field. Mr. Aiken is a film renter first and last and his pet ambition was the ideal, systematically conducted film exchange. With the growth of the 5-cent theater came the necessity of specializing and, on the 24th of January, 1907, the Theater Film Service was incorporated for the renting of films for exhibition of motion pictures. We know the career of the Theater Film Service and how it has grown and grows every day under the ample management of Mr. Fred Aiken. The success of the Theater Film Service is largely due to a most exact and wonderful system in every little branch and detail of its large business transactions.



Fred C. Aiken, of Theater Film Service.

We are specialists, says Mr. Aiken, in a circular to the exhibitors, having no other interests, and devoting our entire time and attention to the furnishing of a high class film and song slide service to best meet the requirements of any theater or locality, no matter how large or small. We employ experts and high class managers for each department, who surround themselves with competent assistants. It is our belief that we have the most perfect system for the successful handling of this class of business of any exchange in Chicago, and we extend to you an invitation to visit us and make our office your headquarters when in Chicago and will take pleasure in explaining our system in every department.

The Film Inspection Department, as you realize, is a very important one, and in which we employ expert men operators (not girls), who carefully inspect every inch of film before it is shipped to each theater, and who know the condition it must be in to run smoothly through a machine with best results, thus doing away with the necessity of a loss of your operator's time in the inspecting of the film before you start your show.

Our Record Department is very complete and accurate; records are kept of all film subjects which have been exhibited by each of our customers and their competitors, also records of subjects desired, by which system our customers are enabled to get what they want and doing away with repeaters.

The above gives a little peep in the working methods of the Theater Film Service and the spirit of the management. The space here is too limited to go into details, and besides Fred Aiken might not be over anxious to teach other less successful people how to make things go in this dull, hot, Summertime.

Of course an enterprising, successful young man like Fred Aiken couldn't help being recognized in legislation and association of trade matters. Fred Aiken was, in 1908, appointed vice-president of the old F. S. A. To be able to devote his entire time to the film renting problem, and realizing that the business of the two sister concerns had grown into too big a proposition for one man to successfully handle, Mr. Aiken has now transferred his interests in the Amusement Supply House and assumed all the controlling interests in the Theater Film Service.

Outside a unique business ability, Fred Aiken possesses a most winning personality and all of us in the trade think he is a jolly good fellow.

THE LECTURES.

Both long and short lectures have been heard at different theaters during the week just closed. One long lecture on Boston, divided into six parts, was particularly good and well illustrated. The slides used in most of these lectures are much better than formerly, showing that slide makers are improving their work and turning out a better product.

The lecture which tells an interesting story about some familiar subject is perhaps the best, while the long lecture on a city is perhaps a little less satisfactory because each part is not complete in itself and few can attend to hear the whole lecture. The main qualities required are good pictures, something novel about the subject and a live delivery. Given these the lecture is certain to be interesting and will please even a critical audience.

St. Louis, Mo.—The Royal Motion Picture Theater Company has been incorporated with a capital stock of $15,000. The incorporators are Frank L. Newman and Joseph Blawitz, of Joplin, Mo., and others.

Making Lantern Slides.

The development of a lantern slide is conducted in the same way as the development of a plate, except that the method of time development is seldom used for the purpose, the extent of development being judged by looking through the slide at the light. More amateur slide makers go astray in judging density than in any other direction; and it is, unfortunately, a matter on which any advice that can be given in words is not of much service.

The trial exposure will help to show how far to carry development. It is always well to keep the dish covered with a card, except when it is necessary to examine the progress of development. The most exposed part of the plate will probably soon go black all over; the least exposed end will always have a good deal which, looked at as it lies in the dish, remains white. Between these two will lie the correctly exposed strip, and we want to find out which this is. When development has gone on for a little time—say a minute and a half, but this varies greatly with different developers, and according to the temperature—it will be found that one or more of the strips bears a fairly vigorous image. If the plate is a backed one, it may be held under water for a moment at this stage, and the backing rubbed off with the fingers or with a sponge; it is then put back into the developer to finish.

Now it may be taken as a fixed rule in lantern slide work that in a properly exposed, properly developed slide the highest lights of all must be almost, but not quite, clear glass. This is quite different from a negative, where even the highest lights must have a distinct deposit on them, or the plate is under-exposed. If when the density begins to look about right, therefore, we note the strip on which, looking on the surface, the very highest lights of all are just a little darker in color than they were before development began, we shall be able to identify the part which had the correct exposure. These highest lights must only be the merest spots—the brightest parts of the brightest parts, to put it another way. Any appreciable area of the plate must have a distinct deposit on it, or the slide will be under-exposed and hard. It is not difficult, even for one who is quite unaccustomed to the process, to decide which is the correctly exposed strip, working on these lines, although it is not easy to put the case in words.

The plate should be rinsed after development and then fixed. If amidol is used as the developer, plain hypo is preferable; any other developer may be followed by an acid hypo bath such as is recommended for bromide or gaslight prints. Hydrokinone is a favorite developer for lantern slide work, and is very suitable. If it is used, the slide should be washed, preferably in running water, for at least a minute between development and fixing. If this is omitted, there is a risk of a yellow stain forming while it is in the fixing bath, and this stain cannot be removed.

After fixing, the slide is washed, just as a negative is washed, and is allowed to dry. When the washing is finished, it should be held under the tap for a moment, while its surface is gently rubbed with a tuft of cotton-wool, to remove any deposit due to the washing water, and it can then be put to dry where there is no chance of dust getting to it. When dry, it may be laid down on a piece of printed paper and its density compared.

Short of actual trial in the lantern, this is the best way to judge the contrast in a black tone slide, but when development has been modified to give a warm color this test is no longer of any use. In any case, the test should only be regarded as a temporary one, and the slide should be tried to a lantern at the first opportunity. In the meanwhile, having ascertained by it the correct exposure for the particular negative employed, we may proceed to give it and to make a slide on the lines suggested.

When the photographer can make black tone slides by contact successfully, he may then be disposed to try his hand at getting warmer colors by development. This is beyond the scope of a beginner's article. The details of the method will be found in the makers' instructions. It consists of greatly increasing the exposure and using a highly restrained developer, often one containing ammonium carbonate. The plates used for this are usually a slower brand than those employed for black-tone slides, but these slow plates can also be used for black tones if preferred. In the same way, after mastering the process of making slides by contact, the amateur may proceed to the making of them in the camera. Some workers do this, even when their negatives are the right size for contact work, holding that they get a better result by the use of the camera. But these are not beginners' matters.

The slide when dry is not finished. It still has to be mounted. The first proceeding is to mask it. Masks are supplied all ready for use, but it is much better for the slide maker to mask his slide with binding strips, as each mask may in that way be arranged to suit the subject. Round, oval, dome-shaped, and round-cornered masks should be left alone; they are rarely suitable to the pictures, and attract attention too strongly to themselves. Putting the slide down, film side upwards, on a clean piece of white paper, a binding strip 3¼ inches long may be moistened and laid down upon it so as to mask all that is not wanted below the picture. If the strip is too wide it may be allowed to overlap the slide for the time being. The slide is then turned round and another strip applied to the top, in the same way, taking great pains to keep the edges of the two strips parallel. The slides are masked by a repetition of the process, and the slide is put aside for the strips to dry. When dry, it is placed film downwards on a piece of card, and any of the strips which project beyond the glass are trimmed off with a sharp knife.

Cover glasses can be bought, but it will be a very clever slide maker who needs to purchase them. As a rule, the spoiled slides will be quite numerous enough to provide covers for the good ones; six good slides out of twelve lantern plates is an excellent average. The plates may be left overnight in some washing soda and water, and the next day, after putting them into hot water for a few minutes, they may be cleaned with soap and a nail brush, well rinsed, and dried.

The glass is attached to the slide by four of the binding strips. Two pieces, each 3¼ inches long, are cut, moistened, and laid face upwards on the table. The slide, with the cover glass placed on it, is then brought down with one edge pressed firmly on the center of one of the strips. The strip is then picked up in this way, and is then smoothed down with the fingers. The two opposite edges of the slide should first be bound, and the strips allowed to dry before the other two are bound.

Before the slide is quite finished it has to be "spotted." Spotting is employed to indicate to the lanternist at a glance how the slide is to be inserted into the lantern. For this purpose, two little spots of white paper are attached to two corners of the slide (or white paint can be used). The proper corners are the two top ones on the side facing the worker, when the slide is so held that he sees the picture on it the right way round. This will be the cover glass side; and it is a good plan to put the spots on the mask before applying the cover glass.—From Photography and Focus.

COLORING OR PAINTING LANTERN SLIDES.

By A. M., in The Practical Photographer.

Many people of cultured taste revolt against the colored lantern slide. Probably this is largely due to the crude colors and careless or ignorant manipulation in most cases. The remedies are obvious. In all cases only transparent colors are of use. It is better to under rather than over-emphasize any color. Suggestion rather than representation is what is required.

Water Color Method.

Pigments useful—Yellows: Aureolin, gamboge, brown-pink. Greens: Viridian, verdigris. Blues: Prussian, Antwerp, ultra-marine, indigo. Reds: Crimson and madder lakes, rose madder. Purple: Purple madder. Browns: Burnt umber, asphaltum, burnt sienna, madder brown. Black: Blue black, ivory black, lamp black. Brushes: Two or three round sables and one large sable mop. Medium: Gum arabic 1 part, water 10 parts. The plate may be painted in its dry condition, or soaked in water and then all surface water removed by dabbing with clean muslin.

Oil Color Method.

This is the more usual plan. For list of transparent colors see the water color method above mentioned. Media used are turpentine, copal or mastic varnish, gold size or Roberson's medium. Skies and flat tints are put in by dabbing with the finger end, previously rubbed smooth on a bit of pumice stone, or the finger end may be covered by a bit of quite clean kid. Use a large in preference to a small brush, and one stroke rather than two. The less the color is "messed about" on the slide the better it will show on the screen.

The Japanese Method.

The Japanese are facile princeps in this matter. The following is said to be their method, or to give equally good results: Dissolve gum arabic 1 part in water 4 parts. Tie a bit of muslin over the mouth of a small jar so that the muslin just dips into the surface of the water in it, and place the gum on the muslin. Strain through two thicknesses of fine muslin; add 1 part glycerin to 50 parts gum solution, and add a drop or two of carbolic acid. This medium is used with the following colors. Brilliant yellow S, carbazol yellow, yellow wood extract, bright olive, dark olive and light green SF, platin scarlet, sorbin red, naphthol red, orange II, vesuvian brown, leather brown, methyl blue BG, indigotine IN, methyl violet B, nigrosin WL.

The effect should be judged by applying a drop of the gum color to a bit of clear glass. The slide should be worked when in a horizontal position. One color may be laid over another if the first is allowed to dry thoroughly before the second is applied.

Tinting, i. e., staining the gelatine of a slide any desired color is done by placing the slide in a suitable dye, such as Congo red, Manchester yellow, Malachite green, Hoffman's Blue, Methyl violet, Bismarck brown, dissolved in water or alcohol. If too dark, the excess may be removed by soaking in the uncolored solvent, as the case may be.

Ordinary colored glasses are generally too crude in color for pictorial effect. But an unexposed plate fixed, washed, and then tinted, may be used as a cover glass. Tinting is very effective in certain cases provided the color is merely suggested. The spectator should be hardly conscious of color, but rather of general effect. For instance, the interior of a building, with windows, may be slightly tinted to suggest a pale yellow light outside. Snow scenes may have a suspicion of blue, etc.

MORE ABOUT CURRENT SAVERS.

In further confirmation of our editorial of last week on the efficiency of current saving devices and in plain denial of the statement in a contemporary that current savers do not steady the light even if they do afford a check on the current, we give the following experience of one of our subscribers:

Gordon Bros. Amusement Company, of Worcester, Mass., who are using the "Hallberg" Alternating Current Economizer exclusively in their theaters throughout New England, have just opened a moving picture theater in the park at Savin Rock, West Haven, Conn. As is generally the case in parks, only 500 volt trolley current is available. The cost for moving picture lamp current with rheostat on 500 volts was over 90 cents per hour. A 500 volt "Hallberg" Economizer has been put in, and the saving guaranteed on the bill is 85 per cent., or about 76½ cents per hour. Another advantage is the absence of heat from the large 500 volt rheostat, and the impossibility of the operator getting a shock, which would injure him on 500 volts. The Economizer is, furthermore, furnished with a light controller, which keeps the light constant when the voltage jumps up and down.

NEW EXCHANGE BRANCH.

The Globe Film Service Co., of Chicago announce that the new office they are opening in Louisville Ky., will, beginning next week, be in shape to handle in the most satisfactory manner the business of managers in the territory adjacent to Louisville and who desire a service of high quality. At present they have under consideration several locations, but the address will not be definitely announced until next week.

This office will be under the management of John H. Zimmerman, who has had vast experience both as an exhibitor and in the exchange business, and all exhibitors securing their service from Mr. Zimmerman may rest assured of a "square" deal and courteous and intelligent treatment at all times.

The management of the Globe announce that within the next ninety days they will open branches from coast to coast and from the Gulf to Canada, thereby localizing their business, and be in a position to give their patrons quick service. At the present time they are operating three offices which are all doing a large business.

Edmonton, Canada.—The Nickelodeum (pictures) has closed its doors owing to poor patronage. The Empire (vaudeville and pictures) will shut down July 3d for a Summer vacation. The Orpheum (vaudeville and pictures), with which the sheriff had recent dealings, has been leased by out-of-town parties and reopened with Chronophone talking pictures. At the Orpheum the opening price was 25 cents, but has been reduced to 15 cents. Fair houses have greeted the novelty in Edmonton. The Grand (moving pictures) ran Burns-Johnson fight during fair week, but not to as much business as was expected. The other moving picture house, the Bijou, reports satisfaction with the Summer business, and have just renewed their lease of building for an even longer period. Every house here complains of the class of films rented out by the branches in Western Canada.

Operators' Column

A FEW WORDS TO OPERATORS.

By F. H. Richardson.

I note that Prof. Kelley asks a "few words from F. H. Richardson" regarding the matter of operators, their wages, incompetency or competency etc. I hardly know what I can say that I have not already said. One thing occurs to me, however, at this time, and that is, that more than ever it behooves operators to perfect themselves in knowledge and reflect their learning in excellence of results. There has in the past been one check on the hiring of incompetent men, viz.: fear of fire. That check is now about to be removed through the use of non-inflammable film, and just what the ultimate effect will be remains to be seen. That it most decidedly will not act to the benefit of operators seems certain, since the manager who is a pinhead—who cares only for the money which comes in to-day and "trusts in the Lord" for to-morrow—will feel free to hire any chump who knows enough to get the film through the machine somehow—anyhow. Operators (?) have worked for ten dollars a week, but with non-inflammable film it is quite possible they will work for a good deal less than even that. Frankly, the writer fears the result of non-inflammable film in so far as it affects the operator. The only salvation is real excellence of work. This may and will save the man who is able to supply it, but the "dub" is going to have a hard row of stumps to hoe, believe me! I do not know of the conditions to which the worthy Professor refers in New York City, but this I do know: If the writer came to that city and was refused a permit to follow his calling he would file a damage suit against that village so quick it would make your head whirl. No city, state or government has the right or power to refuse a citizen to earn his daily bread, provided he can prove his competency, in any lawful manner he may desire. It is none of the New York officials' business whether there be one idle operator in that city or a million. Incompetency is absolutely the only grounds upon which they can refuse a permit legally. Any operator who is competent, and can prove it in court, can collect damages if debarred from the right to earn his living at his calling. That is common sense and it will be found to be law, too. Personally, the writer does not favor trade schools except for the benefit of those already engaged in our line of work. If the average operator could be induced to attend some such school as I take it Prof. Kelley is connected with, I most heartily indorse the proposition—most heartily indeed. The articles the writer puts forth are not designed to initiate the novice into operating—far from it. They are designed to help the men already operating, and hundreds of letters are proof positive that they are accomplishing that very purpose. The basic trouble with the trade school as applied to turning out operators from raw material is just this: The graduate may be ever so capable, yet he lacks actual experience. He has paid for a course and proposes to utilize the knowledge he has gained. He is perhaps much more competent than the average non-graduate man the day he leaves the school. He finds, however, that getting a position is quite another matter, and the usual upshot is that he takes one at very much reduced wages with view to get some practical experience. He may advance to higher wages soon, but meanwhile he has entered an already overcrowded market and by accepting the low wage helped to yet further demoralize things. Freely I grant that in the end his school teaching may—will—be of immense value to him and will aid him greatly in reaching the summit of excellence in his trade. The school as applied to four men out of five now claiming to be operators is splendid, and if it be liberally patronized by them, great good will be accomplished, assuming, of course, that the instruction given is practical and complete. The whole trouble as affecting operators lies in the fact that the motion picture business sprang up so rapidly that it is not systematized. Thousands of theaters and dozens of film exchanges are in the hands of absolutely incompetent men. Thousands of nickel show owners and managers there are who know about as much about the show business as does the proverbial hog about heaven. Take the big shows which are managed by real managers (showmen, I mean), and there you will find a good operator almost without exception.

But really I am taking too much space. I could expend pages of words on this subject which the Professor has asked me to handle in a "few words." My closing word to operators is just this: Non-inflammable film is likely to hit you a severe bump and you had best get real busy real soon, giving the best service there is in you. Learn all you can and then apply the knowledge, else you may find your place filled by a twelve-year-old-$7-a-week-kid sure enough!

WATCHING THE CARBONS.

Franklin, La., June 15, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Wish to thank Mr. F. W. Sweet through the Moving Picture World for his point on "Watching the Carbons." Intended sending in that write-up for your paper, but seeing that another has done so, I relinquish the field to that gentleman, though my idea was a little different from Mr. Sweet's. I have been running a machine, and mostly an Edison, for about three years. At present I have an Underwriters' Model. So take an Edison mount and that is supposed to be stationary when you set the cone, and nine times out of ten you will have to cover up your ventilating holes on account of racking condensors. Another time (it is according how your booth is ventilated) you will have to expose the holes. So if one can't get a ray of light through an Edison mount, try my way of getting it, which is by punching a hole about the size of a pinhead in the opposite side of the lamp house, measuring about two inches back from the front of the lamp house, and then get the center of your condensors; that is the place to get your hole, and as the result you will see on the opposite wall of your booth two carbon points clearly outlined. No more eyes being blurred after this, please. Thanking Mr. Sweet once again,

Yours respectfully,

HOWARD I. HEID.

A PLEA FOR THE EXPERIENCED OPERATOR.

Kansas City, Mo., June 12, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

In your most valuable publication of June 5th is a letter from an operator in Lawrence, Mass., in reference to would-be operators.

He seems to have a good view of the present situation, and I think that "all" fair-minded people will heartily concur with him in his views. At the present time this country is the best in the world for the entire motion picture business, but what will happen to the business if the mechanical end of the industry is not taken better care of? As far as the films are concerned, we all know that they are better than ever and will continue to grow in favor, but how about the way they are projected on the curtain?

There are more "Punks," as we call them, in the booths than there are good men, for the simple reason that they learn to thread a machine and make a patch and then they underbid the man that is trying to make a living for his family with the trade he has learned by hard knocks and years of experience.

Your suggestions under his letter is very appropriate and I think should meet with the approval of every experienced operator in the United States.

Let us hope that some time in the near future we will see nothing to prevent the consummation of our present wishes, and help us in our fight against inexperienced men and boys that are taking the bread and butter out of the mouths of our wives and babies who are looking to us for their support.

It would be a very good thing for the Motion Picture Patents Co. to help the operators out by having the legislatures in the different States pass a law to license all moving picture operators, and make it a penal offense for any man to touch a projecting machine unless he can pass a stiff examination before the Board of Fire Underwriters and the State authorities. Then, and then only, will we get our rights, and men that know how to put a picture on the curtain will be the only ones in the operator's booth.

Hoping that you will find room in your most valuable of publications for this poor attempt, I remain,

Very truly yours,

ONE OF THE EXPERIENCED OPERATORS.

WHAT THE LION DID TO THE PHONOGRAPH.

The roar of a real African lion has been introduced upon the stage with great success in London, and doubtless will be heard very shortly in this country.

It has long been felt that the modern drama needed something to put new life and vigor into it, and at last it seems the needed something has been found.

The play which has been enlivened by the lion's roar is called "The Cuckoo," a lively farce adapted from the French and produced in England by Charles Hawtrey, who plays the principal part. In one scene the roaring of the lion is heard outside the door of the house, and the hero is supposed to go out and cow him.

How was the lion to be represented on the stage in a manner befitting a Hawtrey production? The idea of having a leather-lunged actor or stage carpenter stand without the door and bellow lustily in imitation of the king of beasts was dismissed as unworthy of the highest standard of dramatic art. The suggestion was submitted to Mr. Hawtrey that a lion should be procured from a circus, taken on the stage and poked and annoyed so that he would roar vigorously. After anxious consideration this suggestion was abandoned, owing to the objection of most of the company.

It was then pointed out that a new gramophone could be obtained which would reproduce the roaring of a lion so perfectly that his own wife would be deceived by the sound and start to roar twice as hard in reply. There was a time when the gramophone would have reduced the roaring of a lion to a squeak, but now the machine has been improved so that it will reproduce any vocal expression from the trumpeting of an elephant to the most powerful notes of a Caruso with lifelike fidelity. The suggestion of using this machine was accepted joyfully by the distinguished dramatic manager.

A machine of the newest type, belonging to the London Gramophone Company, was taken to the London Zoological Gardens, and installed in the cage occupied by a splendid specimen of the lion family and his two wives. At first it was hoped that the lion would roar into the gramophone of his own accord. It is the habit of the noble beast to roar at times simply for the exercise of his lungs, just as the cat yowls and the dog barks, merely for pleasure and to satisfy a physical craving.

When the machine was placed in the lion's cage he eyed it suspiciously, walking about it and lashing his tail as if in irritation. He did not like the machine, evidently. He suspected a trap, but he was not to be caught in it. He heard the light clicking noise of the machinery in the interior of the apparatus. That scemed to irritate him very much. He lashed his tail some more and his whiskers stuck out angrily. He gave vent to an omnious growl. Everybody was hoping that he would let off a terrific roar in front of the machine, and then it could be hurriedly snatched away from him, heavily charged with noise.

But the lion disappointed them. He came closer to the machine and looked carefully all over it. He peered down the trumpet, which happened to be made of pasteboard. He saw that it was empty. Then he smelt it carefully. The smell seemed to please him. Suddenly he took an enormous bite at the trumpet and then he sat down and calmly ate it. The theatrical men hastily snatched away what was left of their machine, without any roar in it.

They decided that it was not worth while leaving an expensive talking machine in His Majesty's cage. They would have to adopt more artful and ingenious means of accomplishing their purpose.

The machine was then placed about two feet in front of the bars of the lion's cage. A fine, tempting piece of steak, weighing about fifteen pounds, was held on a pitchfork between the mouth of the receiving trumpet and the bars. The lion naturally put his paw between the bars and reached out for the meat. As he did so, the meat was drawn away from him toward the trumpet, till it was just out of his reach.

This naturally angered him terribly, and he gave vent to a roar that made the machine shake and filled it with sound. "Gr-r-r-r-r-rah-h-h-h" roared the lion.

Again and again the trick was tried, and the lion uttered every expression of rage known to his family. He gave loud and deep roars, short and long ones. He leaped about his cage and hissed terribly. He made the kind of noise which would shake the forest and make all the other inhabitants tremble for their lives. Only when he is terribly insulted does the king of beasts make such a tempest of sound. The worst insult you can offer to a lion is to place a fine piece of meat before him and then take it away. The sounds he was caught making at the London Zoo were the same that you would hear in the jungle if some other lion or some Laemmle Awards the $25.00 Prize!

I herewith award the $25 prize to Mr. Chas. M. Mapes, 148th Street and Third Avenue, New York, N. Y. He has given me just the sort of name I wanted for my new film manufacturing company. But in addition to that, he also sent a rough sketch, suggesting a design for a trade mark to appear on every film. I had his sketch drawn over by my artist and have reproduced it above. Take a good look at it. You'll see it thousands of times hereafter. The full name of the company is:

"INDEPENDENT MOVING PICTURES CO. OF AMERICA," but by taking the initial letters of the first three words, we obtain the trade name, and this is the name I will popularize. It is short and easy to remember. And it is only a question of weeks when "IMP FILMS" will be in everybody's mouth and everybody's theater. I intend to make them the world's highest standard in photography, conception and execution. During the recent contest thousands upon thousands of names were suggested. Hundreds of them were good, dozens were excellent, but "IMP" stood highest in my esteem. One other gentleman, Mr. Jas. W. Bradlet, 159 W. 36th Street, New York, N. Y., also sent in the name "IMP." I have awarded him an extra prize, but the first prize goes to Mr. Mapes because his suggestion was more complete and included a design for a trade mark. I appreciate the flood of good wishes which poured in upon me, and will try to live up to the high mark set for me by my well wishers. In the meantime keep your eye peeled for "IMP" ANNOUNCEMENTS LATER!

"IMP"

Cordially yours,

Carl Laemmle

All communications concerning my new manufacturing venture should be addressed "Carl Laemmle (personal), 196 Lake Street, Chicago, Ill."

very rash animal had attempted to take a nice young deer away from him.

At last the theatrical men, excited by their success, moved the apparatus too near the lion's cage. Out shot the huge yellow paw of the infuriated beast, and quick as lightning it crashed through the trumpet.

The same experiment was tried again, with a little more caution, and finally the tormentors were able to carry away the only perfect records of a lion's roaring ever secured.

When the machine was set to work in the play, and the public heard the roaring of an angry lion just as it sounds as he is about to leap at his victim, the effect was electrical, and everybody was held spellbound with interest and excitement. Everybody recognized the evidence of realism in the sounds. Few of the audience, however, knew what interesting scenes had been enacted when the records of the lion's voice had been secured, scenes that were fully as interesting as any in the play.

While the lion's voice was being recorded a series of moving pictures of his actions was taken. These are reproduced so that yau con see just how he sniffed at the gramophone, chewed up one trumpet, grabbed at the meat and finally how he smashed another trumpet.

This experiment suggests a series of entertainments which might be arranged with the assistance of any large public menagerie. All the noises made by the various animals might be recorded. Take the howling of the leopard, the trumpeting of the elephant, the snorting of the rhinoceros, the grunting of the bear, the squealing of the pig, the singing of the bird, and so on, and record them on the talking machine. Have the same animals photographed by a moving picture machine, and let these pictures be shown while the animals are uttering their characteristic noises. Thus the life of the jungle might be brought before the inhabitants of the city in a very realistic, but perfectly safe manner.

European experts are now planning a combined moving picture and phonographic apparatus, which will give the world an altogether new knowledge of natural history. It can be left in the wildest part of the jungles so that a perfect record may be obtained of the sights and sounds that occur there when no human eye is present. Then we shall see, perhaps, the sort of animal assemblies and hear the debates that were described by Rudyard Kipling so ably in his "Jungle Tales."

The places where the jungle people can hold their meetings undisturbed and really behave as they please are now very rare, even in the heart of Africa or Asia, and soon they will disappear altogether. One of the Indian princes has found it necessary to establish an enormous preserve for tigers in order that that interesting family may not be wiped out. But even then his tigers are half civilized. It would, therefore, be a great service to knowledge if science could secure for us some accurate and interesting pictures of the wildest forms of jungle life before civilization ended that life forever.—The American Examiner.

THE MESSAGE.—How a Baby Saves a Mother from a Perfidious Wretch. One of the most truthful maxims is, "When flatterers meet, the devil goes to dinner," and well he might, for the flatterer can work more deeds of villainy than any other criminal, for, as Shakespeare says, "No rigor doth become black villainy, so well as soft and tender flattery." Hence, the smooth, persuasive reasoning of the city chap made a deep impression on the simple farmer's wife. Effie Harris had two apparently ardent suitors, David Williams, an honest, big-hearted farmer, and Harold Woodson, a Summer boarder from the city. Effie wisely chose Dave, and we see the happy couple returning from their wedding and starting in on a happy, simple life. Dave and Effie romp about the fields, among the cows and sheep, like a couple of wild children. Dave is comfortably situated and is able to provide his wife a pleasant though modest home. For five years they are happy indeed, a little child coming in the meantime to shed an extra ray of sunshine, but, alas! the tempter appears in the person of Woodson, who returns, and with honeyed, flattering tongue poisons the mind of Effie and makes the grind of simple life decidedly irksome. Repeated entreaties on his part make the poor woman drift into the wrong path so far as to listen to his persuasion. At length she almost decides to go away with him, but later she struggles against the inclination until a note telling her he will be at the old bridge to take her with him decides her. Leaving a note of farewell for her husband on the table, she goes to the place of meeting. She has hardly left when baby, finding the letter and innocently taking it up, follows on, guided as if by the hand of Providence. Baby arrives on the scene and hands the letter to mamma just as Woodson drives up in an auto. What a powerful lesson this is to the poor woman. Who can resist the hand of the baby? For ever since the beginning we have harkened to the injunction, "And a little child shall lead them." It is needless to add that the woman sees clearly the error of her way and recoils before it is too late, leaving Woodson standing in the road, perturbed and chagrined. This subject is in every way up to the Biograph standard of dramatic and photographic excellence, while the scenes, which are of decided bucolic nature, are the most beautiful ever portrayed. Length, 944 feet.

THE COUNTRY DOCTOR.—A Story of Temporal Deeds that Reap Spiritual Reward. In the peaceful valley of Stillwater there is sunshine. All nature smiles as we make our way up the lane, lined on each side with blossoming trees and fragrant flowers, until we come upon Doctor Harcourt, one of God's noblemen, seated on the veranda of his house with his wife and little daughter Edith. All are carefree and happy as we stroll with them through the barley fields, lanes and daisy beds. It is indeed a beautiful sight, a trinity of souls, each living in the other's being. But the fates are jealous, and there are gathering clouds to shut out the radiance of their happy existence. Little Edith is taken very ill, and the doctor is at first inclined to think his wife is unduly alarmed, but upon examining the child he realizes the illness to be serious indeed—so much so that it would probably be fatal for him to leave its side until the crisis is past. While so engaged, a poor woman of the village hurries to his home to enlist his services for her little girl, who she fears is at the point of death. Oh, God! what a situation. His own child needing his undivided attention most urgently, on the one hand, and duty on the other. Duty, that relentless deity of the honorable which so often compels self-sacrifice, beckons him on. Irresolute for a moment, he at length goes, assuring his wife that he will be but a few minutes away. Arriving at the humble cabin of the woman, he finds her child very ill indeed, requiring speedy and unerring attention to save her. Meanwhile, Edith, his own child, has grown worse, and the mother has despatched the maid to hurry him back home. When the maid arrives and tells him the conditions, he for a moment wavers, but then his duty seems clear to him. If he leaves the poor woman's child, death is inevitable, so he dismisses the maid with the word that it will be only a few minutes longer and then he will return. Little Edith sinks rapidly, so the maid is again sent. This time he is about to leave, as the child is out of danger and will recover. So he leaves the poor family, happy and relieved, to rush madly to his own home. What a contrast! There across the lifeless form of his dear child lies his moaning, horror-stricken wife. A slave of duty, he yields the life of his own dear child to save the life of another's. The valley of Stillwater is shrouded in darkness. Such are the temporal deeds that will find reward eternal. Length, 942 feet.

UP THE LADDER WITH TOM BOWLINE.—When Tom Bowline went into the navy he was resolved to mount to the very top of the ladder, and Tom was the sort of a boy to crystalize his dreams into actualities. He worked hard, studied much, went up through the various ratings in the enlisted stage until at last he attained his ambition—a commission and an honored place on the quarter deck. Incidentally, he also secured a dainty maid for a wife, but—ahem—that's anticipating the story.

The project to present Tom Bowline and his endeavors for a commission on the screen met with the warm approval of the United States Government and authority was given not only to use Government navy yards and vessels, but officers and enlisted men wherever their services were necessary or desirable. It is a most unusual thing for such permission to be granted, but this is a story of the navy, by the navy, and its scenes are correct in every detail. It was produced under the sanction of the Navy Department, and in some of the incidents in the story several hundred men and officers are shown in naval tactics of all sorts.

The film begins with Tom's application for enlistment, and every stage of the process from this time on until he is a finished sailor is accurately depicted. He is shown with his mates practising wigwagging, on the bridge, handling the great guns, at hammock exercise, going down in diver's armor and various other naval matters that have never hitherto been shown to the public.

In the course of his work he meets a pretty girl under romantic circumstances, saves her from drowning, and when the commission he wins through earnest work at last comes to him, he weds the girl and his happiness is complete. Approximate length, 995 feet.

A SQUEEDUNK SHERLOCK HOLMES.—Brilliant with sunshine, glad with the whispering wind coquetting with the leaves, yet it was only a scene of horror to H. Septimus Hunks, constable of Squeedunk township, b'gosh. On jutting rocks were drops of human blood, the grass was trampled and over there the mark of a woman's heel. With a mind trained to acute criminal observation through long experience in chasing delinquent debtors and arresting over-happy farmers who had supped too long of the cider when it was hard, he reconstructed at a glance the whole awful tragedy.

Love and hatred, there was the cause. He could even hear the frenzied woman's scream still lingering amid the sighing trees. Iron though he was, he shuddered at the horrible tragedy these mute rocks had gazed upon, and was off like a shot to arouse the countryside. His duty was plain. He would track down the perpetrators of this fearful deed and catch them ere the body of their victim was cold. He would prove to a palpitating world that the brains of Squeedunk were equal to any emergency.

Rallying his posse, he soon found, with the help of Mehitable Higgins, more evidence. A blood-stained woman's handkerchief bearing the initial "H." Valiantly the band of heroes bore forth on the trail. It led through divers and devious ways, but they hung to it, even though the river itself sought to hide the criminal's tracks. Again and again they lost it, only to re-discover it each time. At last a great light dawned on the constable's brain—Squire Halpin. The "H" on the handkerchief. He had not held court that morning. The evidence was plain.

Torn though his soul was by this awful fact, yet he would not swerve. With his men and women of determination he invaded the squire's office just as the latter was uniting in marriage a young couple. He produced his evidence; the squire must go with him. With a laugh the girl wife sprang forward. The handkerchief was hers. Her newly made husband had fallen on the rocks that morning and cut his hand—but here, when the rubeus understood how their constable had been led astray, let us draw the veil. Approximate length, 500 feet.

AN ABSENT-MINDED CUPID.—Poor Harold! Love was a canker in his heart because his limited means would not permit him to dress in swell clothes, while his rival for Florabel's affections, the head clerk of the very office in which he worked, dressed in such elegant attire. It galled his clerkly soul to be thus contrasted in the fair one's eyes, but he persisted in his wooing despite the condition of his suit. Did he but have money how quickly he would administer a metaphorical slap on the head clerk's love wrist.

One portentious evening Harold determined his lady love should have a treat. He would dine her at a restaurant, but, alas! there was an overcoat needed. He bridged his trouble by borrowing one of Percy, a fellow clerk, and hied himself forth with Florabel to sup. Here his troubles began. An elderly gentleman, afflicted with absent-mindedness, appropriated the overcoat as he went out, and with it went all of Harold's small stock of money.

When he had finished dining, what a situation Harold found himself in. No money to pay the bill. He was panic-stricken and Florabel was indignant. She was more, she was angered, and when the head clerk, who chanced to be in the restaurant, came forward, she accepted both his financial assistance and his arm and Harold was left to think it over on the corner.

The elderly gentleman soon discovered his mistake, however, and returning forthwith, was not long in finding Harold. Harold's story was soon told, and the elderly gentleman was touched. He would do something, and he did. Although Harold knew it not, he slipped a substantial sum in the overcoat pocket with a note signed "An Absent-minded Cupid," and Harold was placed on his financial feet and in a position to ask Florabel to wed. She accepted him, and in the morning what a dash he was able to cut in the office, oh! what a dash indeed. Approximate length, 500 feet.

THE BLACK SHEEP.—The story of the prodigal son is applicable to every age and day and one never tires of hearing it told. It preaches as fine a sermon and tells as sweet a story of the lost son and his return as has ever been pictured. This latest Essanay release, "The Black Sheep," is a picture of a great, soul-stirring story.

Daniel Roberts is the father of two youngsters of about the same age, yet vastly different in their moral make-up. Frank is the model "good child" of the village, loved by his father and mother for his good behavior, while John is just the opposite, being unruly to his elders, always into mischief, and bringing mortification to his despairing parents.

Ten years elapse, and we find John sowing his wild oats, while Frank obtains employment in a broker's office. While he stays late at the office nights, John entertains chorus girls at midnight suppers. John's conduct finally exasperates his father, and one night when he comes home intoxicated he is ordered from the house and told never to return until he has proven himself a man.

During the twenty years that follow, Frank accumulates a vast fortune, but his extreme selfishness and miserliness causes him to neglect his parents, who are now growing old. Unable to pay the mortgage on their little home, the father and mother call at their son's Wall street office with the hope of securing aid from him. They find the broker very busy, at first declining to give them audience and finally insulting the old gentleman by sarcastically handing him a small coin when the father tells him of their need. Cursing his son for his base ingratitude, the father takes the mother away. Nothing is left for them but the poorhouse. They are taken there and given shelter, while their son, who had been such a model youth, lives in luxury, laughing at the scoring the newspapers give him for the ill-treatment of his aged parents.

But away out West, John Roberts, now a millionaire mine owner, reads the news of his parents' plight; his big heart melts and he makes all haste to return East. Going to the poorhouse, he makes himself known to his father and mother and takes them away, promising them a home with him.

When he hears the story of his brother's conduct he resolves to punish him. Knowing the man's greed for money and power, at an opportune moment he steps into the wheat pit and arrays himself against the erstwhile Wheat King. This scene, "Brother Against Brother," is one of intense interest and excitement. Surrounded by money-mad brokers and speculators, the two brothers fight it out, John staking his rich mine against the vast wealth of his brother. At the stroke of the closing gong, Frank Roberts is no longer the King of Wall Street, but a penniless beggar.

The happy reunion of father, mother and their long-lost son makes a pretty sequel to this most interesting picture. This is a story which will please every one in your audience. The photograph is excellent, while it is splendidly interpreted by actors of exceptional talent.

THE COIN COLLECTOR.—This series is a delightfully pleasing combination of magic and picturesque views, beautifully hand-colored.

Seated before his iron chest is the aged coin collector fondling some of his prize specimens. He indulges in a light luncheon and then dozes off to sleep, whereupon his trunk opens and one after another coins of ancient mintage appear and dissolve in turn into a scene illustrating some custom in vogue at that time by the respective nation.

After a number of delightful presentations have been rendered, the collector awakens. He fears he has been robbed and upon approaching his treasure box it opens and a group of lovely women, personifying the different pieces, appear, and a golden rain pours over the shoulders of the overjoyed money collector. Approximate length, 493 feet.

RAISED IN THE COUNTRY.—Desiring to take a foreign trip, Mr. and Mrs. Sapp have their child examined by a physician, who advises sending the mite to the country during their trip abroad. The servant suggests that she be given custody of the little one while visiting her daughter's farm.

Three years later the travelers return and their child is brought back to them, but it has assumed stupendous proportions and is entirely beyond their control. The parents have manifold troubles and annoyances. Finally they determine to visit the doctor again, and an operation by electro process to remove the excess avoirdupois is undertaken. Excessively strong current being applied, the child is reduced to a rag. An application of counter current results in the child regaining its normal proportions. Approximate length, 502 feet.

VISIONS OF MOTHER.—Taking a walk with his mother, the young man asks permission to go out and get acquainted with the world. As he is her only son she will not hear of him leaving her.

The young man cannot overcome the desire to see the world and so leaves his home under cover of darkness. The old lady is now left entirely alone, excepting for a servant.

The young fellow meets with success and is having good times. He meets an actress with whom he falls deeply in love. One night he feels remorse at his having left his mother, and when he goes to sleep he experiences a vision. His mother appears to him, and all the sorrow of her lonely existence. When he awakens he immediately resolves to leave his associates and return to his mother.

He arrives at his home, but finds it locked, and learns that his mother died of a broken heart while he was enjoying life in the midst of strangers. Approximate length, 664 feet.

A BAD CASE.—This subject will give rise to unrestrained laughter and will infect your entire audience with the jovial microbe.

A learned man is seen in his laboratory studying microbes. His friend enters and after exchanging salutations the visitor is proclaimed to be full of microbes.

Through a microscope the victim is permitted to view the many microbes with which he is infected and as each microbe is displayed to the view of the audience its exhibition creates wild applause. The microbes shown are as follows: Political Microbe — Functionary Microbe — Mother-in-Law Microbe — Chauffeur's Microbe. The poor man faints and the doctor of science laughs at his terrified friend. Approximate length, 314 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

THE PRETTY FISHERMAIDEN.—A beautiful drama enacted on the sea coast with nature's settings, which lend a grandeur and intense interest to the entire subject.

Fickleness of man and a woman's jealousy are the principal features that fascinate throughout.

The tourist, attracted by the beauty of an innocent fishermaiden, is seen to hold the hand a trifle longer than the paying for a purchase would call for ordinarily and the glow of the eyes gives the observing wife occasion to pursue the husband. Her judgment does not fail her, for she traces the man to the home of the maiden, where both get an upbraiding. Not content with this, she conspires with a sailor to dispose of her rival and for a fee the latter promises to do the deed. However, he only put her in a boat and casts her adrift. She is later observed fling a distress signal and rescued, thus foiling the plot of a jealous woman. Approximate length, 589 feet.

EXCITING STEEPLECHASE.—An intensely interesting and exciting series of views, depicting in a very vivid manner all the thrills and delights of a steeplechase.

The attention of your audience will be riveted upon the screen for every inch of this subject.

Many accidents occur to riders and horses and all details are faithfully reproduced. Excellent quality and perspective. Approximate length, 364 feet.

Then we will see him depart with his regiment for the Philippines and finally we will have a series of realistic scenes showing a skirmish with a band of rebels.

Scene I. The Lure of the Uniform.—Here we are in front of a U. S. recruiting office. Its appearance is familiar to us all. A fine young soldier, one of the regular detail in charge, patrols up and down—and now we see our hero, a fine country lad, strolling up. The young soldier points out the advantages of the life and argues his case so thoroughly that our friend decides to go in and enlist.

Scene II. Sworn In!—Inside the recruiting office we find an officer of the regular army in charge and in his orderly we see the fine soldierly type of boy which make up the rank and file of the army.

Security Building, - - - - - Chicago, Ills, U. S. A

Now our friend comes in, stripped to the waist for his physical examination. First the officer examines his teeth, then takes his height and weight. He is satisfactory and is asked to sign the papers signifying his desire to join the army. He signs and is at once sworn in with the solemn oath of allegiance. Now he is a full fledged soldier and the orderly conducts him from the room. He will have a day or two to arrange his affairs and then his career will be started.

Scene III. Leaving Home and Mother.—The time has come for the parting with the white haired old mother and with the final kiss the dear old lady nearly breaks down. But she bravely stifles her tears and says farewell as her only son goes away to join the army.

Scene IV. The Awkward Squad.—Now we are in a U. S. army post, standing in front of a row of barracks and we see a young drill sergeant with a squad of recruits—among them our young friend. They form what is known as "the awkward squad," and they are to be instructed in the first rudiments of soldiering. Of course they are very raw and the trained soldiers jeer at them from the barrack's windows as they clumsily march up and down; no two seem to be doing the same thing, and little wonder the sergeant is exasperated. Contrast the recruits with this stalwart young non-com. who swaggers by.

Scene V. A Blanket Court Martial—Pals.—Two or three months have now passed and our recruit has become quite a soldier. As we see him in his uniform he hardly looks like the country boy of our first scene. But what is this? He is rudely seized from behind. A squad of men rush up with a blanket and in a trice our friend is being tossed into the air. He is bruised and sore when they finally let him go. As he ruefully rubs his elbow one young lad comes up and offers his sympathy. This is the beginning of a long and lasting friendship. Every soldier has a pal and these two boys will be pals from now on.

Scene VI. Making a Soldier of Him.—Here we see what is called "setting up exercises"—or Butt's calisthenics. This is usually done to music and is one of the prettiest and most effective exercises in a soldier's life. We can clearly recognize our friend in the near foreground.

Now we see the company afield—a practice march is on and the recruits are having a drill with the shelter tents.

And in the morning when the bugler is routed out for reveille, we see the sleepy boys crawling out of their tents and lining up for morning inspection and roll call.

Now we have some of the cavalry exercises for which the U. S. Army is famous. The horses are being trained to jump hurdles and some of the lads are practicing Grecian riding stunts and other novelties for special exhibition purposes. The horses are magnificent animals. Nowhere in the world will you find such fine horses as in the U. S. Army.

Scene VII. Off for the Front.

Scene VIII. A Skirmish in the Philippines.

Scene IX. After the Fight.—And by moonlight come the litter bearers and the surgeons searching for the dead and wounded. They find our friend and his pal. A mumbled "good-bye, old man, send word to my mother," is all that is said and the brave soldier boy is carried away to his long rest.

Scene X. The Waiting Mother and the Lonely Grave.—Back in the hills of Vermont the old mother waits the return of her boy. As she reads her Bible her thoughts wander far away and she sees as in a vision, a lonely spot where the soldier boy's pal lays his last tribute on the solitary grave.

A GREAT WRONG RIGHTED.—To a Summer resort comes a city chap to spend his vacation. He flirts with the fisherman's daughter and soon entices her to run away with him. They live together happily for many months until the mother of the young man arranges his marriage with a rich heiress. Unfortunately the fisherman's daughter reads the letter of his mother, and with endearing words she begs him not to leave her. Tempted by the gold of his fiance, he throws aside the woman he loves to marry the rich heiress. But she is not to be cast away so easily. She stands before the church door and denounces her betrayer upon arrival with his intended. The young lady refuses to be married to him. The shame drives him from home and soon he sinks lower and lower.

The fisherman's daughter with her young child in her arms returns to her father, who takes her back. Five years have passed. The little girl sells flowers to help support her mother. In a beer-garden she notices a man acting very queer. She sees him writing a note and drawing a revolver to end his earthly troubles. She prevents him from killing himself and is surprised to find that she saved her father's life. It is through her that her parents are reconciled, and that the great wrong which has been committed on her mother is righted. Length, 810 feet.

THE SIDE-BOARD FOLDING-BED.—When leaving their home for their Summer vacation the Professor forgets to lock the window. A tramp enters and is soon fast asleep in the new side-board folding-bed. In the meantime the Professor remembered his carelessness and sends his wife home to close the window. She, seeing the tramp's clothes and thinking the Professor forgot them, carries them away. She then closes the folding-bed and exits. The tramp, finding the clothes gone, dons a suit of the Professor's wife.

He is seen leaving the house by the window and is chased by a policeman and a big crowd of spectators. Some novel chases continue the picture. Seeing no escape, the tramp remembers the folding-bed, runs to the house and locks himself up in the bed. He is pulled out, however, and caught in his own trap. Length, 505 feet.

ROOM-MATES.—Ted and Fred are room-mates and always ready to play tricks on one another. Fred lays a trap for his friend, but gets caught himself. Now Ted tries to come back. Meeting Fred's girl he invites her to supper. Fred tells her to accept and whispers in her ear a plan how to get even with Ted. When at the supper table, he changes places with his girl, put on her hat and cape, and surprises Ted when lifting his veil.

A drugged cigar plays a part in the next trick. Now Ted gets an idea. He buys a giant firecracker to frighten his friend when he is asleep. The surprise is mutual, however, as Fred had the same idea and the firecrackers go off at the same time. Length, 335 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

A CHILD'S LOVE.—A man who is infatuated with a pretty actress spends most of his time in her company, thus depriving his own wife and child of his society under the pretext of being out of town on business. We see the feather-brained lover at the theater dancing attendance upon the vivacious Miss, while his unhappy family are alone, longing for him to come to them that they might share a part of his love. After sitting up half the night waiting for her husband's return the good wife becomes suspicious that there is some one else who has a greater hold upon his affections, so after putting the child to bed she gives vent to her wounded feelings.

The next night after dinner, when the man leaves the house, his little daughter follows him to see where he goes. He makes straight for a florist's, where he purchases a large bouquet, which he orders to be delivered to the home of his lady love. His little child waits for the delivery girl to start out with the flowers and then she follows her direct to the home of the actress. Going up to the flower girl the child offers to carry the bundle up to their owner, and thus she gains access to the apartment of the woman who is making her mother's life so unhappy. When the youngster is presented to the Miss, she defiantly throws the flowers on the floor and reveals her identity. The woman is horrified to learn that her admirer is a married man, and, feeling a sense of duty, she writes a note telling him that she will see no more of him, and leaves it with the little girl to hand to her father. Soon the man puts in his appearance and is astonished to find his little girl facing him. The child hands him the note and after reading it he realizes his great mistake and returns home with her, where he vows to turn over a new leaf and in the future live to love his wife and child alone. Length, 524 feet.

SPANISH ARMY.—This picture is extremely interesting and educational, for it shows us at close range many incidents connected with the life of a Spanish soldier. In the first picture we get an excellent view of the Plaza in Madrid, where in the foreground is a magnificent altar upon which Mass is being celebrated in the presence of the devout multitude. We see the recruits taking the oath before the altar, after which each one passes under the flag, which he kisses with deep veneration. Then we get an excellent view of the army on parade, marching down the main street and presenting a most inspiring picture.

In the next picture we see the army in camp, where they are shown on dress parade and being put through their many war manoeuvres, which appear extremely realistic. Length, 442 feet.

THE TRAGIC ENDING OF SHOVE TUESDAY.—Shrove Tuesday (the day before Ash Wednesday) is celebrated in a most befitting manner in foreign countries where the people hold large carnivals and enjoy high festivities before entering upon the tranquil season of Lent. This picture reveals a story of a man who, not contented with the love of his good wife, is lured by the splendor of the carnival, from her side to enter into the celebration and go about care-free, carrying on a flirtation with every pretty girl he meets. The good wife, who becomes lonesome at home, makes up her mind to enjoy a share of the gaiety, so after concealing her countenance behind a mask she starts out and joins the revelers. Realizing that her husband is unfaithful to her, she keeps a close watch on his every action, and to her horror sees him stroll away to a remote part of the park with a pretty woman, where, seated on a bench, he makes ardent love to her. The wife, who has followed him, witnesses the whole procedure from her hiding place behind a hedge. In the course of the conversation between the lovers, the man takes a picture of his wife from his pocket, and after gazing at it, the young woman in a jealous rage tears it up. The faithful wife, whose feelings are wounded beyond measure, vows vengeance, so hastening off to a costumer, she disguises herself in man's attire, and hurries back to the merry throng. This time she finds her rival seated alone under the tree, so advancing in a friendly manner she strikes up an acquaintance with the coquette, the latter thinking that it is a young man who is addressing her. Soon the unfaithful husband returns to his place and to his horror finds his lady in the company of another man, and, becoming infuriated, he challenges his rival to settle their claim upon the affections of the young woman by the code of honor. The masquerader accepts the challenge, so after securing seconds the rivals retire to a secluded spot where they face one another in a pistol duel. The handsome youth falls a victim to the first shot, and upon removing the mask the victorious combatant is horrified to find that it is his own wife whom he was mortally wounded. The good woman in her last words forgives the unfaithful husband for the insults which he heaped upon her and passes away in his arms. Length, 459 feet.

TUNISIAN INDUSTRIES.—Pictures of travel in foreign countries are always sure to please, for so many American pictures continually show us scenes that are in close contact with our every-day life, and therefore we like a change in scenery and customs. In this interesting picture we see the natives of Tunis in their different enterprises, and it gives us an idea of the manners and customs of a race so far apart from the Anglo-Saxon. First we see the old wood carver at his work, making all sorts of beautiful objects. Then the scissors grinders, men weaving beautiful rugs, making rope, bamboo baskets, sieve making, and many more enterprises too numerous to mention. The last pic-

THE LITTLE DETECTIVE.—After bidding his good wife and little girl an affectionate good-bye, a kind-hearted, honest man, who has charge of a concern where there is a lot of money intrusted to his care, leaves his home and goes to his place of business. Upon arriving at the office he begins his daily duties, but is unaware that a burglar is hiding in a box in the same room. The man busies himself around the office, and soon he unlocks the safe which contains the money. Having occasion to step from the room for a few minutes, he gives the thief an opportunity to come from his hiding place and, after taking the money out of the safe, the latter makes his escape. As the robber is leaving the building he accidentally bumps into the little daughter of the man whom he has just robbed, but the child in her haste manages to get a good look at the suspicious-looking character. The little one enters the office and hands her daddy a package, which he accidentally forgot, after which she hurries away to school. Soon the man has occasion to go to the safe and, to his horror, discovers that the money is missing. He calls his employer and states the facts of the case, but can throw no light upon the affair, for he is positive that the money was in its proper place only a few moments before. His explanation has little weight upon the suspicious employer, and immediately he accuses the innocent man of taking the money and discharges him on the spot.

The crestfallen man returns to his home, where he is relating the incident to his family when the police officers enter and place him under arrest, taking him to the station house, where he is put through a seathing examination, after which he is locked up, charged with the theft.

One day as the little girl is on her way to the store she happens to meet the same fellow who bumped into her as she was entering her father's office, and feeling certain that he is the culprit, the little one does some detective work on her own responsibility. She follows the man and sees him enter his lodgings, after which she hurries to the police station, where she states her case, and soon the detectives are put on the trail of the suspected fellow. They come to the place and catching him unawares as he is counting the stolen money, place him under arrest and hurry him to the jail, where he is confronted with his little accuser. The child manages to retain her equilibrium and defiantly faces the culprit, making him admit his guilt. He is then thrown into a cell and the innocent man is liberated and once more joins his happy family. Length, 774 feet.

THE FAN.—In this artistically colored film, which is another masterpiece of trick photography, the public will enjoy a picture of rare beauty. In the first scene we are presented with an old wizard who, in his efforts to entertain a charming lady, has a large fan carried in and placed in the center of the stage. Upon this fan appear various types of beautiful girls in numerous classic poses, and each transformation reveals a graceful and artistic tableau. Length, 213 feet.

THE WITCH'S DONKEY.—Four bold brigands going through the forest meet an old witch leading a donkey, and ever ready to perpetrate a theft, the dishonest quartette attack the old woman and, after tying her to a tree, they take the donkey and hasten away to their cave in the mountain. Soon the old witch liberates herself and heaping curses upon her assailants, she finds her way to her lonely hut.

The robbers tie the donkey in the stable and as one of the band is removing the blanket from the animal he discovers a note in the folds, and upon investigating reads that in one of the donkey's hind hoofs there is a key to a box containing a large fortune. The fellows try to secure the key, but the donkey, who is under the spell of the witch, kicks and squirms in such a manner that they finally give up the task and liberate the animal. The intelligent old donkey makes a bolt for liberty and finds his way back to the home of the old witch, who gives him a hearty welcome. Length, 445 feet.

TRAINED FALCON.—In this extraordinary picture we are shown how a trained falcon is effectively utilized in hunting wild rabbits, thus eliminating the use of rifles in bringing down the game. In the first picture we see the party, starting for the hunting ground, and arrived there they put a ferret into the hole to chase the rabbits out. A man holds the falcon and as soon as the animal makes a dash for liberty the falcon springs upon him, holding him fast in its clutches until the hunter liberates the victim from the throes of the ferocious captor. Length, 403 feet.

THE LION TAMER.—The world's greatest thinkers have from the dawn of time considered love the strongest force in human nature; love brings out all that is best within us, and often jealousy born of the same impulses leads us to commit acts that no other force would develop. Our story deals with love and jealousy, the opening scene, "Supper Time at the Hampton Farm," reveals to the auditor that Tom Weston and Frank Fairley, two farm hands, are both in love with Farmer Hampton's pretty daughter, Mary. She shows us that her favor is apt to be given to Frank, and Weston's clouded face betrays plainer than words the gnawing jealousy that tugs at his heart strings.

"Four Weeks Later" we witness a meeting at the old school house lane between Frank and Mary. Tom also happens upon the scene and overhears Mary promise to become Frank's wife; he, however, determines to know from the girl herself if this promise is final, and seizing the first opportunity, demands an interview alone. High words follow and Frank's advent leads to a quarrel in which Farmer Hampton takes a hand. Tom's violent temper causes him to threaten both the girl and the man she prefers. Farmer Hampton discharges Tom and he leaves vowing vengeance, and his strange method of fulfilling that vow is a trick fate holds in reserve for all concerned in this little domestic story.

Six months have passed and things have not prospered with Weston; idleness, brooding, and strong drink have done their work and we find him travelling the dusty highway a tramp and an outcast. His wanderings lead him to stop with others of a gaping crowd, who are watching the workmen of a country circus pitch their tents, and prepare to amuse the populace. A quarrel occurs between two of the laborers, and the owner of the show discharges the instigator. Tom applies for the vacancy, secures the job and joins the show. "Six Years Later" the man's violent temper and daring disposition have at last found a fitting occupation. Tom Weston, "The Lion Tamer," the bills read. We see the former farmhand rehearsing his animals for the act he intends to use the coming tenting season. Our family group we met in the first scene are clambering into the old farm wagon, Mary and Frank with their little boy, Farmer Hampton and his sturdy wife, all bound for the circus, little dreaming of the tragedy the day will see enacted. The old-fashioned one-ring circus of twenty years ago has passed away forever, and our picture from now to its startling conclusion illustrates faithfully scenes in and around a show of this kind.

"Old Enemies Meet." Frank, with his wife Mary, who leads their little boy by the hand (his big blue eyes dancing with delight at the unwonted sights the circus holds), are passing the lion's den in the menagerie top, when a voice they both remember greets them, and Tom Weston, Mary's discarded lover, stands there, garbed in the tawdry dress of a "Lion Tamer." "Don't you remember old friends? won't you shake hands? What a handsome boy—so like his father." Frank's surprise gives way to anger as he listens to the sneering words of his former rival, and quickly passing his wife and child on to her father, who is just ahead, he turns on Weston with outspoken manliness: "You are a poor excuse of a man, Weston, even if you do make a living cowing the poor brutes behind those bars. You threatened vengeance against a woman, a brave act truly. We have no desire to renew our acquaintance with a man like you, and don't you dare to speak to a member of our family again." And Frank rejoins the others.

Smarting under the deserved rebuke, Tom's anger grows. Suddenly a diabolical means of vengeance flashes across his brain: "I'll throw their brat into that cage." To think with this violent man is to act, and the startling events leading up to our final scene, tell so plainly in the picture that we prefer to leave the surprise this issue holds unheralded. Length, 975 feet.

LED ASTRAY.—An adaptation of the widely known and universally popular melodrama, "East Lynne." The opening scene shows Carlisle entering with his bride, Isabel. The servants welcome them. Carlisle introduces his wife to Barbara, who is insanely jealous of her. Tea is served, and, at her husband's request, Isabel sits at the piano and sings. Five years pass by and the home is blessed with two children. The mother and father are observed in a pretty domestic scene as Barbara enters and speaks to Carlisle, who departs with her, leaving Isabel jealous and suspicious. Levison, who is in love with Isabel, enters and tells of his love. He is sternly repulsed, crosses to the window and, looking out, sees Carlisle and Barbara in the garden. The latter is weeping and Carlisle is endeavoring to comfort her. Levison calls Isabel to the window and, looking out, misconstrues her husband's actions, and, when Levison again urges his suit, she consents to elope with him. Leaving the villain for a moment, Isabel goes to the nursery, softly kisses her sleeping children good-bye, offers up a prayer to heaven, then joins her companion below. After writing a note to Carlisle telling that she has gone forever, she leaves with Levison. Carlisle, returning shortly after, seeks his wife, and in doing so finds the note. He falls in a chair grief-stricken. The contents of the note are made known to all, and every one save Barbara is horrified. She is triumphantly happy. Some time later, in reading the paper, Carlisle sees his wife's name among those killed in a railway accident, and, believing himself free, he marries Barbara. Isabel, however, was not killed, and we find her with Levison, but very unhappy. Cruelty and neglect has been her lot. She picks up a paper, reads of her husband's marriage to Barbara and also sees his advertisement for a governess. She is heart-broken, but resolves to apply for the position. She disguises herself cleverly, applies and is engaged as governess. The sight of another woman occupying her place is more than she can endure. Her one consolation is in being once more with her children. The little boy is taken ill and no hope for his recovery is held out by the doctor. The mother-nurse attends to her child devotedly, but sees the little one slowly fading away. Unable to longer conceal her identity, she removes the disguise, the little boy joyfully recognizes her, throws his arms around her neck in one last effort, then falls back dead. The mother is wild with grief, and, while mourning her loss, the other members of the family enter. She is heart-broken over the loss of her child and falls sick herself. She realizes that her end is near, and calls for her little girl and husband. The erring woman kisses her child and asks forgiveness of Carlisle, which he grants. She tells of her unjust suspicions and a pathetic reconciliation ensues, after which Isabel passes away. Length, 565 feet.

THE DRAMATIST'S DREAM.—A. Shakespeare Jay, a young dramatic author, writes a play entitled "The Hour of Detention" and invites his friends to a private reading of the same. They come and he reads to them for two hours. Some fall asleep, some are interested, while others pretend interest. At the end all congratulate him effusively and drink to his health. He sends the play to a manager and awaits a decision with impatience. One morning, after receiving a batch of letters but not the one he desires, he falls asleep while smoking and begins day dreaming on his sofa. He imagines that he receives a letter from the manager accepting his play and promising $200 a week royalty. His friends meet him on the street and congratulate him. The first night audience cheer and throw flowers at him, the manager presents him with a watch as a token of his esteem, the leading lady crowns him with a laurel wreath, and afterward he entertains them all at supper, is toasted and responds with emotion. At this moment he is awakened by a knock at the door. The postman brings his manuscript and a letter from the manager declining it. Disgusted with life, he tears up the letter and throws the manuscript into the fire. Length, 390 feet.

MINE AT LAST.—Helen and Jim Grant, her sweetheart, are enjoying a pretty love scene when George Flint, a friend of both, comes down the road. He is also in love with Helen, but it is evident that Jim is the one preferred. The two men, who are about to leave for war, bid Helen good-bye and go off together. We see the soldiers on their way to battle passing Helen's house. She throws a rose to Jim, waves a parting farewell, then breaks down and weeps.

In the camp George attends to the mail and succeeds in intercepting all the letters between Jim and Helen, causing each one to believe that they are neglected and forgotten. Flint, while in camp, has a very serious attack of heart trouble and, upon the doctor's recommendation, is granted a three months' furlough. He returns home, where the folks are surprised to see him. He visits Helen, tells of his illness and of his leave of absence. She offers her sympathy and asks for Jim. George then tells her that her letters were received, but Jim ridiculed them and told his comrades that he didn't care for her. Hearing this, Helen is furious and, when George tells of his love and asks her to be his wife, she accepts on the impulse of the moment. In due time the wedding takes place, but Helen shows plainly that she is not happy. George, elated over his success in winning Helen, mails a paper with notice of his wedding to Jim. The latter receives it, and, when he sees the notice, breaks down completely. At the close of the war we find the folks at home preparing a royal welcome to the returning soldiers. They arrive, and, when Jim sees Helen, he goes to her and asks why she never wrote him. She declares that she did, but that he never answered her letters. Then Jim realizes that Flint was the cause of their estrangement. He denounces Flint publicly. Helen is also of the same mind, and Flint, in passion, is about to strike her when Jim appears and prevents it. Another attack of heart failure shortly after kills Flint. Six months later Jim calls upon Helen, asks her to be his wife, and, when she accepts him, he fondly embraces her, saying "Mine at last." Length, 610 feet.

WEARYBONES SEEKS A REST AND GETS IT.—This clever comedy pictures the trying experiences of Wearybones, who is afflicted with a chronic desire to sleep. While reposing peacefully on a park bench he is rudely awakened by a passing policeman and told to move on. The hobo wanders away and finds a cosy nest beside a fence. The cops, in pursuing a burglar, jump on him and pound him with their clubs until they discover he is not the man they want, then allow him to go. Weary comes to a field, spies a stack of straw, curls in out of sight and tries once more to sleep. Some boys, who have noticed the tramp, wait a few moments, set fire to the straw, and Weary barely escapes with his life. He next takes refuge in a box alongside the road. Two lovers stroll along, sit down and disturb his slumber. In trying to escape Weary upsets the box and again gets the worst of it. He passes a yard, finds a carpet nicely arranged for a nap, crawls beneath it, and is just dozing off when the women come out and beat the carpet. Again he is disturbed, walks down the street, stops at a back door of a house and asks for food. While the woman is getting it, the tramp falls asleep and refuses to be aroused, whereupon she dumps a pan of hot ashes over him, which brings Weary to his feet. He goes on his way and passes a spot where some men are preparing a blast. They yell at him, but the tramp thinks it a joke and laughs back at them. The blast goes off, Weary goes up out of sight into the clouds and, coming down, falls through the skylight and on

THE PRINCE AND THE ACTOR.—Henry B. is an idolized Pierrot-impersonator at a large theater. He shares the triumphs with his beloved, the beautiful Jeannette, who is prima-donna at the same theater. The two are very happy together, until Jeannette one day yields to the temptations of another man's riches and elopes with him. The poor B. is very grieved, but as he is appointed director for a princely court theater, he has so much work to do that he almost forgets his misfortune.

Two years have passed, and we find B., as theater director, at his office. He expects some actors and actresses, who are to be engaged. They arrive, and one of them is Jeannette. All the memories of old and happy days come back to him. His old love for Jeannette awakes and becomes stronger every day. He does not know that the prince also loves Jeannette, and that she on her part prefers the love of a prince to that of an artist.

One evening he goes to see her in her elegantly furnished apartments. She receives him very coldly and asks him to leave, as she expects the prince. He gets wild with rage, and seeing a full-sized picture of the prince hanging on the wall, he spits on it. As he turns round the prince is standing right in front of him. B. is now sentenced to imprisonment with hard labor for life for lese-majesty.

Twenty years later the old prince, who is still stately and buoyant, visits the prison. The face of an old, white-haired prisoner recalls an old, forgotten memory to his mind. He asks the manager about this man, and his supposition is confirmed. It is B., who has now passed twenty years in prison for the sake of his love. He is now immediately released and allowed an annuity, which enables him to spend the rest of his life without financial worry. Shortly afterwards we see the old man, broken in body and mind, sitting in his chair in a plain little room. He knows that he is dying, and has sent for a minister to administer the Sacrament to him. The minister enters, accompanied by a deaconess. It is Jeannette. When he sees her a happy smile brightens his face, before his eyes are closed. Still in death, he holds his hands on the head of Jeannette, who kneels down by him, weeping mournfully.

A TALE OF TEXAS.—Tom Barry is the right-hand man to Frank Hadley, owner of the Half Moon Ranch in New Mexico.

A bad Mexican, Valdez, has been cheating the other cowboys at poker by using six ace cards when the laws of the game allow only four. Tom catches Valdez at his trick, and he exposes Valdez, then kicks the Mexican out of sight. Valdez determines to kill Tom, and he conceals himself in the ranch house, awaiting a favorable opportunity to plunge his dagger into Tom's back.

Tom enters with the Boss and a cattle buyer, who pays the Boss two thousand dollars for a lot of cattle. The Boss puts the money into his wallet, and places the wallet into a cupboard drawer. Valdez, who has hidden behind a sofa, sees this, and when the three men leave the room the Mexican steals the wallet and escapes unobserved through a window. At a quiet spot in the woods Valdez counts out a hundred dollars to "blow in" on a good time, and he conceals the remainder of the money in the wallet in his clothing. He hears someone approach, and runs off, leaving some of the money on the ground. Tom has ridden up, and, finding the money, he pockets it. Valdez, running along the river bank, misses his footing, falls into the river, and is drowned. Tom, riding along, is met by the ranch mail carrier, who gives Tom a letter. It is from Tom's wife, telling him that on her way to him she had been compelled by illness to remain at the station forty miles distant. The letter was completed by the keeper of the hotel at which the wife stopped, and he informs Tom that his wife gave birth to a boy baby, and that she calls continually for him.

Tom spurs on his horse, determined to go at once to his wife and child.

Meanwhile the Boss has discovered the loss of the money. Accompanied by some of his cowboys, he overtakes Tom, searches him, and finds the money that Valdez had dropped; and, placing a pistol at Tom's head, he threatens to shoot Tom unless he tells where the remainder of the money is. Tom protests his innocence, and the cowboys stand by Tom. The Sheriff comes on the scene, and when Tom acknowledges that he alone knew where the money was placed, the Sheriff arrests Tom and they ride off.

Poor Tom, crazed by thoughts of his wife alone at such a time, shows the letter to the Sheriff and begs to be allowed to see his wife and babe. The good-hearted Sheriff agrees to let Tom visit his wife for one hour before going to jail.

But the river gives up the dead Valdez, and a ranchman, finding the wallet, returns it to the owner, whose name is lettered in it. The Boss immediately dashes off to secure the release of Tom, whose innocence is now established.

Tom is with his wife and babe, his happiness clouded by the thought that another's crime will tear him from his loved ones.

The Sheriff is pacing the floor of the hotel sitting-room. He looks at his watch. The hour is up. But the Sheriff can hardly bring himself to perform his hard duty. While he hesittes, the Boss enters, to get a drink after his hard ride. He explains to the Sheriff that Tom is innocent.

Poor Tom is kissing his son for the last time when he hears footsteps on the stairs. In despair he goes slowly toward the door. He cannot bring himself to open it. But it is the friendly hand of the Boss that opens the door and grasps Tom's hand as he says: "Forgive me, Tom. Come back to your job."

And Tom is the happiest man in New Mexico as he kisses his wife and then dances about with joy.

THE SPANISH GIRL.—A story of a Spanish girl's cunning pitted against two bad men, in which the humorous side predominates.

One of these bad men, Bud, has won the love and confidence of Carmecia, a Spanish girl, whom he later robs of her jewels and then skips out, leaving a note which reads: "Good-bye, Birdie; we are off for the Far-away.—Bud."

The girl vows vengeance, and the manner in which she is able to turn the tables is most gratifying to her.

Two years later Bud and his pal return to the neighborhood. They immediately proceed to get drunk and shoot up the town, for which they are taken into custody and thrown into jail. Imagine their surprise to discover that Carmecia, now the sheriff's wife, is their jailer.

Bud begs for their release and vows that he still loves her, but she only laughs at him.

Finally he tells her that if she will let them out they will break into the county treasurer's office and steal $6,000 which they know to be on deposit there and divide it with her. She finally consents to this plan, but to insure their return she takes their clothes and makes them put on female attire.

They divide half of their spoils with her and she makes them re-enter the jail to get their clothes, and as they do so she hangs the heavy iron door after them and again gives them the laugh.

Later telling them a mob is coming, she gets them to pass out their half of the stolen money to her. After the mob disperses, they wish their money back and she willingly passes the bags and packages back to them. She then places a chisel and sledge within their reach and instructs them to break their way out through the window.

Soon they are miles away, and as they greedily sit down to divide the spoil, imagine their discomfiture and anger when they discover that their bags of gold are only iron washers and that their bank-notes are only bundles of paper.

To add to their injured feelings, they discover a note from the girl which reads: "The boys are after you, so stay in the Far-away.—Birdie." Approximate length, 825 feet.

LOVE PLOTTERS.—The strength of this comedy lies in the acting of the young lady, the daughter of a grumpy old man.

The old man unfortunately catches the daughter and her young man spooning, and as he has other plans for his daughter, he has the imprudent young man ejected from the premises.

A series of very funny scenes follow, in which the young man resorts to many disguises in order to be near his sweetheart, but always, through some unforeseen accident, he is discovered by the old man and in each instance is bodily thrown out.

He finally becomes desperate and decides to elope with the girl, and writes her to be prepared to take advantage of the first opportunity, which comes much sooner than expected.

The old man is about to take his daughter and Lord Needthedough, whom he has chosen for his daughter's future life companion, out for a ride in his auto, but he has not reckoned on the young man, who is Johnny-on-the-spot.

Just as they are about to drive off, an explosion takes place under the car, previously arranged for by the young man, and as the old man and the lord jump out to locate the trouble, the young man jumps in from the opposite side, opens the throttle, and away they go. They are married before the old man and his companion arrive on the scene.

The usual anger and afterward relenting is indulged in and then our young folks return home happy. Approximate length, 900 feet.

Box Ball Doubles the Profits of Your Theatre

$800 a Month With No Expense But Rent!

Moving picture shows pay out big money every week for employes, song slides and film rental. But Box Ball is a business that often brings in $200 in six days, yet has absolutely no expense but rent. One customer with four alleys took in $1,845.20 in 59 days.

Customers who spend only five cents in the theatre spend more than a dollar at Box Ball. Crowds are quickly fascinated with this new game. They never tire—the more they play the more they want to keep on playing. No one wants to quit loser, so he plays game after game—often spending hours when he first intended to spend a few minutes.

When the crowds are in your theatre give them free tickets for the first game. Every one will play at least once and many will become regular customers. Women and children play as well as men—they form teams and clubs and often spend a whole afternoon or evening.

Install one of these money-making games in connection with your theatre. Rent the room above or get the store next door. Put in two or more alleys and you will be simply amazed at the wonderful profits.

Your only expense will be rent. Players set the pins with a lever and the balls are automatically returned. One man to collect the money is all you need, and he can care for as many as ten alleys.

One game usually lasts six minutes with two players. At 5 cents each that's $1.00 an hour from every alley—you can figure the profit yourself. With ten hours' play two alleys will bring you $20 a day, or $120 every six days.

Send for our free booklet and learn how you can own one of these great money-making games for only a few dollars down and the balance payable from your profits. Remember—you pay just a few dollars down, and your profits the very first month should more than pay the entire cost of the outfit. Write for booklet at once. Address

DECLARE YOUR INDEPENDENCE

Just as Your Forefathers Did in the Days of Long Ago!

The history of this land of the free shows how the world's most gigantic bluff was called by a handful of brave spirits. If you're afraid the Film Trust will bite your head off the minute you quit paying that $2 a week extortion, how do you explain their absolute failure to make good a single one of their bluffs to date? Assert your independence; use my films and my service and I'll back you up heart, soul, body, breeches, lock, stock, barrel and bank account! Not a single soul has suffered by doing business with me, and what's more, NOT A SINGLE CUSTOMER OF MINE IS GOING TO SUFFER. The people are clamoring for the independent pictures. Give them what they want! That's business.

the finest of the world's products—to bother with you. Can't be annoyed. He further says that the Independents are "making good" with Trust film secured before going Independent. What a joke. We only use their film for our very cheapest service, and if you can use them and will write us, we will rent you Six reels a week for $20.00, and allow you to sub-rent to one other exhibitor and allow you to earn whatever you can get; also will allow you one-half of rentals on all extra customers you get in addition to the first one. Isn't that getting money pretty easy. This offer is only good from our Chicago office.

Do you notice our price offerings on supplies and accessories. And remember we handle only the best quality of supplies.

Exhibitor—stand pat—pay no attention to any so-called precedents of suits gained by the Trust. I will show you before long where they have in all cases manufactured a "Dummy" film plant or theatre—brought suit and got confession of judgment from them by crooked use of the courts.

Box Ball Doubles the Profits of Your Theatre

$800 a Month With No Expense But Rent!

Moving picture shows pay out big money every week for employes, song slides and film rental. But Box Ball is a business that often brings in $200 in six days, yet has absolutely no expense but rent. One customer with four alleys took in $1,845.20 in 59 days.

Customers who spend only five cents in the theatre spend more than a dollar at Box Ball. Crowds are quickly fascinated with this new game. They never tire—the more they play the more they want to keep on playing. No one wants to quit loser, so he plays game after game—often spending hours when he first intended to spend a few minutes.

When the crowds are in your theatre give them free tickets for the first game. Every one will play at least once and many will become regular customers. Women and children play as well as men—they form teams and clubs and often spend a whole afternoon or evening.

Install one of these money-making games in connection with your theatre. Rent the room above or get the store next door. Put in two or more alleys and you will be simply amazed at the wonderful profits.

Your only expense will be rent. Players set the pins with a lever and the balls are automatically returned. One man to collect the money is all you need, and he can care for as many as ten alleys.

One game usually lasts six minutes with two players. At 5 cents each that's $1.00 an hour from every alley—you can figure the profit yourself. With ten hours' play two alleys will bring you $20 a day, or $120 every six days.

Send for our free booklet and learn how you can own one of these great money-making games for only a few dollars down and the balance payable from your profits. Remember—you pay just a few dollars down, and your profits the very first month should more than pay the entire cost of the outfit. Write for booklet at once. Address

The Comfort of the Public.

The other day when we entered a moving picture theater a courteous usher took us in charge and said: "I will place you near a fan." And so he did. And we were grateful to him for this comfort, as the temperature of the house was fairly high. Moreover, while we sat watching the pictures, another attendant came around with glasses of iced water for the audience. We carefully noted these little indications of a desire, on the part of the manager, to minister to the comfort of his patrons, and we think they are worthy of mention here as showing that such little courtesies are never wasted. We ourselves, remember them, and we have no doubt that the scores of other people in the theater also remember them and are correspondingly grateful, notwithstanding the fact that the position near the fan and the iced water were inexpensive concessions.

It is surprising, indeed, how easily comfort can be handed out to the public at a comparatively small expense. The moving picture theater manager who makes a point of giving attention to these and other details which show the frequenters of those theaters that their personal comfort receives particular attention is sure to reap a rich reward. The large hearted public never forgets. We were talking recently to the proprietor of a moving picture theater up town and he interested us by saying that his house, which is a prosperous one, is practically a family resort for the neighborhood. There are literally dozens of families who patronize his house almost every night in the week during the season. If the entire family is not present, at least some members of it put in an appearance. He attributed the success that he has in running his theater to the fact that wherever practicable he was personally present to look after the comfort of his patrons. By that means he has succeeded in building up a very valuable personal connection.

We state these two facts by way of example to other moving picture theater managers. Little personal comforts, attention, civility and the like, are good investments. Moreover, the cleanliness of the theater, its good ventilation, and its neat and orderly appearance are all factors which contribute to the comfort of an audience. They fall in the category of the little things which count. Particularly at this time of the year, when the outdoor life offers so many counter attractions, is it incumbent upon the manager of a moving picture theater to have his house as attractive as possible, and he can do this not only by showing good pictures, giving good music and the like, but also by ministering in many points to the comfort of his patrons.

The Board of Censorship.

The question of a National Censorship Board, which has been discussed in our editorial and correspondence columns during the past few weeks, has brought forth a mass of correspondence on the subject that would more than fill a whole number of The Moving Picture World if we were to print it all. Some of the communications depart so far from the main points at issue that they may be passed over; but the gist of the opinions of disinterested parties, and whose opinion is most to be considered, is that there should be a National Board, that it should be located in New York City and that it should consist of men of experience. It should be composed of cool, sober, broad-minded men. They should be drawn from various walks of life and be of as widely different temperaments as possible. They should be able to reason and think and give a logical reason for the rejection or acceptance of any picture or scene. Instead of being solely composed of representatives from civic bodies there should be a representative for the manufacturers, some one who is conversant with the details of moving picture making. It is absurd to condemn a film simply because it may contain a murder or a robbery. If such scenes are not shown with a morbid desire or to create sensational thrills, they are permissible, and if the producer is alive to his duties they can always be presented in a clean and inoffensive manner. The governing board which we first advocated is now a reality and doing good work to systematize and regulate the business. The right kind of Censorship Board could do even more for the success of the motion picture, in that they would inspire the confidence of the public and educate the producers into furnishing just the kind of pictures that will keep up the public's interest. This Board of Censors should have the power to condemn not only immoral or morbid pictures, but also those that are technically poor and silly productions, such as wanton breaking of crockery and furniture and the long and pointless chases.

The Tariff Question.

This month the government is to appeal against an adverse decision recently given by the customs authorities on the duty of imported films. At present this stands at 25 per cent. ad valorem, but the government seeks to materially increase the duty. It would be idle for us to attempt to forecast the result. The tariff is the plaything for political parties and plain people never know what is likely to happen in respect to it.

Another phase of the tariff question as effecting the importation of films is evidenced by some information recently given out at Washington. It seems that J. J. Murdock and other prominent citizens of Chicago who are interested in the importation of moving picture films called upon Secretary MacVeagh and suggested that an internal revenue tax be placed upon every film in this country. It is certain that the government loses a great deal of revenue by reason of the fact that imported films are duped in this country. And it was demonstrated to Secretary MacVeagh that in following this practice of duping, moving picture concerns in this country are evading the 25 per cent. ad valorem duty on films, thereby placing large importers at a disadvantage. It appears that Secretary MacVeagh is inclined to agree that an internal revenue tax upon films can be imposed. He promises to give the matter further consideration before making any recommendations.

Of course, the copyright law which came into force on Thursday last is powerless to reach the dupers of imported films, as there is no copyright in them. Mr. Murdock and his associates have the sympathy of all right minded business men in trying to stamp out a nefarious and injurious practice. Our only fear is lest, with other and larger classes of tariff revision, the comparatively small matter of films may escape attention, and we hope Mr. Murdock and his associates will not relax their efforts in this matter.

Current Saving Devices Once More.

Two weeks ago we replied to a puerile article that was printed in an insignificant moving picture publication wildly reviling all current saving devices that were not advertised in its pages. This week the ignorant and illiterate "editor" of that sheet, like a dog returning to his vomit, laps up the words with which we sought to cover up his mistakes and again relieves himself of a mass of mingled abuse and technical absurdities. He plumes himself, while discounting our own knowledge of the subject, by exulting over his own experience of 20 years, an experience, by the way, for which we have only his assurance, an asset of somewhat doubtful value. As a matter of fact our own practical experience with the optical lantern goes back more than 25 years, when electricity was not used for projection purposes. Current saving devices, it is hardly necessary to point out, are of a very recent origin in connection with the modern electric lantern.

In order to fill his somewhat lean and non-informative columns, the amateur "editor" of this amateur sheet bodily conveys our entire article of June 26 and then appends to it a number of interrogative sentences which have obviously been supplied to him from an interested source.

Editors in difficulty for copy remind us, by the way, of the following incident which actually took place in a newspaper office: A certain alcoholically inclined conductor of a newspaper returned to his office late one night, only to discover that he had not written his editorial for his next paper. However, he retained sufficient sense to be able to bodily lift an editorial from another publication; so, pasting it on a blank sheet of paper, he scrawled at the beginning of it, "What does our esteemed contemporary mean by this?" and sent the whole thing to the printer. We presume that the amateur "editor" to whom we are obliged in the cause of truth and common sense to devote so much of our space this week, found himself in a similar difficulty, without, let it be said, the saving grace of acqua fortis.

Now for the facts of the matter:

It is not the province of the Moving Picture World to state editorially which current saving devices have been passed by the Electrical Bureau of New York City and the Board of Fire Underwriters, nor to enter into any discussion as to the reasons why certain instruments have been passed and others have not. It is very easy to find out from these bodies or the manufacturer which instruments have been passed, and to find out why certain instruments have not been passed. The Moving Picture World cannot believe any exhibitor would have thrown out a current saving device and gone back to the rheostat, unless due to improper selection of the current saving device. The experience of hundreds of theaters in Greater New York and vicinity shows that current saving devices, properly selected, with due reference to the voltage and number of cycles of the alternating current used, enable the exhibitors to effect very large savings in their current bills, and to obtain better illumination without violating any of the rules of the electrical bureau or other inspecting boards.

It may even be a fact that one of the current saving devices short circuited the neighborhood and that the Electric Company made the exhibitor take it out. This, however, would seem to show merely that a particular instrument was defective or improperly installed. The same thing has frequently occurred in the transformers used by the Electric Companies themselves, which are built on precisely the same electrical principles as the current saving device mentioned in our editorial. But electric light companies have not discarded transformers because some of them have been defective. It may be a fact that some tests were made in a large theater and the device ordered away. This proves nothing, especially in the face of the fact that there are over a hundred moving picture theaters in Greater New York now using current saving devices, and moreover that the New York Edison Company will not allow any moving picture machine to be used on their circuits in the Bronx, where only alternating current is supplied, without a current saving device in the circuit in place of the rheostat.

The Moving Picture World does not know that a current saving device was installed in one of the largest theaters and "in ten seconds it went on the bum." This may have happened, but if it did happen the instrument was defective or was not suited to the conditions under which it was used. To say that a current saving device of the transformer type built for the conditions existing in any moving picture theater and used intelligently, does not result in a considerable saving of money to the user, shows a degree of ignorance of actual conditions so complete that it seems useless to attempt to impart any knowledge of modern practice to a scissors and paste amateur "editor."

The assertion that the upkeep of a current saving device of the transformer type runs away with the saving is another absurdity. Any user of transformers is well aware that there is no cost of upkeep, whereas in all rheostats there is a gradual destruction of the resistance material whether wire or something else, and in most rheostats used for moving picture work, the destruction of the wire is so rapid that coils have to be replaced quite frequently with the corresponding cost to the owner.

AROUND THE GLOBE.

Three weeks ago, under the heading of "Coming Headliners," The Moving Picture World gave an advance notice of some length to the Kalem Company's film "The Japanese Invasion." This week a cablegram order for a copy of the film was received by the Kalem Company. Another World advertiser very recently received a very substantial order from Japan, which mentioned The Moving Picture World as the source of information. Other World advertisers tell us that they have received business through this paper from India, China, Russia, Sweden and the most unexpected sources. We merely mention this as it serves to show that The Moving Picture World is worthy of and lives up to its title.

Our Sydney correspondent writes that Australians have been rather behind and slow in encouraging the moving picture show, due chiefly to the influence of the itinerant exhibitor whose wretched shows did not invite continued patronage. Notable exceptions have been West's enterprises and the Spencer Theaterscope Company. This latter company are now building a magnificent theater, specially adapted for moving pictures, with a seating capacity of 2,000. The Spencer Theaterscope Company are also dealers in machines and accessories and importers of films, besides being manufacturers of local film subjects. Our correspondent says that there are now over five hundred moving picture shows being operated in southern Australia, and that they are steadily on the increase.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

By F. H Richardson, Chicago.

CHAPTER IX.—THE LAMP.

A good picture cannot possibly be produced without good light and the better the light is, other things being equal, the better will be the picture. Good light cannot be had with a poor, dry lamp with 2 or 3 inches of the cable ends burned to a crisp. It is astonishing how little attention many operators pay to their lamp. I have been sent for by theater managers to see what was the trouble that their light was so poor and found that I could only move the lamp adjustment screws by grasping the handle and twisting hard enough to very nearly break things. And that was all in the world that was wrong. No matter what make of lamp you use, take it entirely apart just as soon as its adjustments move the least bit stiff and proceed as follows: After removing all screws and taking the lamp entirely apart, grease all parts thoroughly with vaseline. Now wipe off the surplus grease and drop the parts into a box of good graphite. Shake (don't wipe) off the surplus and put the lamp together. If you have been using a dry lamp you will be astonished at the difference and how much more accurately you can adjust your light. A very common fault with many, in fact, almost all lamps, is the tendency of the carbon arms to "wobble" sidewise, due to the fact that the rack bars (the bars which slide up and down to adjust the carbons) being too small. With thes small bars, if there be the very least play in the boxing which holds them it is magnified many times out at the ends of the carbon arms, which frequently you can swing fully ⅛ of an inch. These lamps may be all right when new, but after being used a short time the fault develops. The metal warps a trifle through heat—at least I suppose that is what causes it—and then there is lost motion. The rack bar should be 1 inch wide one way, though it may be very thin the other. A little lost motion wouldn't count for much then. This fault is very aggravating, especially when working with alternating, which requires very close adjustment of the carbons for the best results. With direct current the play is not usually enough to do material damage. Every few days dress off the inside of your carbon contacts. They gradually accumulate scale and get rough so that good contact with the carbon is not had. This is very bad since it adds electrical heat to the natural heat from the arc, resulting in loss of power and the weakening of the carbon arms and clamps. The bronze clamps put out with most lamps have but little strength when hot. If you are troubled with excessive breakage have a blacksmith make you a set of arms and clamps of Bessemer steel, using the old one for pattern. They will last for years. Another almost universal fault with lamps is too small a binding post hole. If your binding post won't take No. 6 wire run a drill through the old hole if there is metal enough. If not, then attach your wires by using a copper terminal, an excellent form of which is the Bell terminal, shown in Fig. 27.

To attach a copper terminal to a flexible cable, strip the insulation from about 2 inches of the wire, cleaning it and the inside of the clip thoroughly. Now lay the wire in the clip, as shown in the center illustration, Fig. 27, leaving enough wire projecting beyond small lug to bend back and reach well into the large lug. Clench small lugs down tightly, bend wire back over and clench down large lugs, as shown in lower illustration, Fig. 27. Large lugs are intended to hold the insulation in place, but clenching them down on the raw wire ends makes just that much additional contact. To attach to lamp, remove binding post screw and put some washers on it, put it through hold in clip and screw down tightly, clamping clip to binding post. These minute directions may seem unnecessary to some of the older operators, but you would be amazed at the number of "operators" who can't, or don't, do the smallest job properly.

Unless there is an extension on the carbon arm for the purpose of removing the cable from the intense heat of the arc it is not advisable to attach your cables directly to the lamp binding posts if you are using a powerful light. The heat from the arc is so intense that the cable ends soon become charred, thus necessitating the removal of 2 or 3 inches, frequently. Also the wires are liable to burn off at any time. The reason for this is that copper, when subjected to heat, has a tendency to oxidize or scale and when the individual strands of a cable are so fine and each is subject to the action over its entire surface it does not take long to reduce the available current carrying cross section to a point where it is too small to carry the current. Electrical heating is now added to the heat of the arc and of course the whole thing soon burns off. Some manufacturers have recognized this condition and have added an extension to their carbon arms which takes care of the matter nicely. Where these are not present you may overcome the difficulty by making, from No. 8 steel wire, an arrangement like Fig. 28.

Attach one end to the binding post the same as you would a copper terminal and to the other attach the cable end, using a small stove bolt with washers and clamping the cable and wires together tightly. Make the extension of a length to suit your own individual case, but 3 inches usually is plenty long enough. If too long it will interfere with the free movement of the lamp. This kind of extension will last indefinitely. When you get a new lamp, or put in a new carbon arm, remove the lamp, put in two long carbons, clamping them firmly in place. Now squint along the two carbons and see if they line with each other sidewise. That is to say (to make myself clear), would they appear in line with each other were the lamp in place and you looking through the condenser opening? If not, carefully file your carbon arms, with ⅝ round file, until the carbons line exactly. This is of much importance, especially with alternating, if you expect to get the best results and get them all the time. Where the lamp house is not asbestos lined the writer has found it a good scheme to lay a sheet of asbestos in the bottom, letting it bend up in front as far as bottom of condenser opening. Where lamps have a backward and forward movement adjustment screw with fine thread, the writer disconnects this screw entirely and attaches a handle so that he can pull the lamp back or push it ahead. The handle must extend through back of lamp house, of course. Be very, very careful that the insulation between the carbon arms and lamp is perfect. If it is poor on both there may be current leakage which will be waste pure and simple and will keep your lamp house charged all the time. Sometimes the lamp house may be charged and and you cannot discover where it comes from. After ascertaining that none of the fine cable strands are doing the mischief brush off the top of the lower carbon arm carefully. Sometimes carbon dust or a piece of carbon will bridge the insulation enough to carry current to give you a lively shock.

THE LAMP HOUSE.

Little need be said on this subject. All lamp houses have their good and bad points and all, so far as the writer knows, lack ventilation which can be controlled by the operator, except to a very limited extent. Personally the writer prefers ample ventilation in a lamp house, but arranged so far as possible to avoid direct currents of air, though he is not sure that even these are hurtful. Lack of ample ventilation creates excessive heat in the lamp house, which in turn abnormally heats the back condenser lens, as well as the wires inside the lamp house. The hotter your lens the greater the expansion and consequent liability to breakage. Some say keep the lamp house tightly closed or you will br-r-eak your condensers—let's see! The front condenser lens gets pretty warm itself, don't it? It is exposed to every vagrant breeze that blows, is it not? It scarcely ever breaks, does it? It seems to me there is a moral lying around loose here somewhere. The writer firmly believes, and has proven it to his own satisfaction, that there will be little condenser breakage (provided other conditions are right, see "Condensers") if one could run with the whole back out of his lamp house. But running with closed lamp house and then opening the door, if for but a second, soon after the lamp is cut off, produces a sudden change in temperature, and bing!

there she goes. Give the back condenser plenty of air all the time, the same as the front one has, is the rule I have adopted. Of course, there is somewhat greater liability of breaking the back lens, since that gets the hottest, but the front one gets pretty hot, too. There is not so much difference after all. I don't assert positively that I am right, but I think I am, and I'm not breaking many condensers either—maybe one in a month, maybe not so often. Keep your lamphouse clean and the rods it slides on well lubricated. Keep the screen which covers the vent holes clean. It clogs up rapidly with a fine, white ash, the residue of the water glass contained in carbon cores.

LENSES.

Hundreds of managers and operators have written the writer asking whether the high priced condensing lenses were really to any appreciable extent better than the cheaper grades. Unquestionably they are, provided you deal with a reliable firm which send you the really high-grade lenses in return for the higher price. I am sorry to say, however, that some unscrupulous firms, well knowing that the average manager or operator is qualified neither by knowledge or experience to judge the quality of a lens, ship out a cheap lens to the man who has paid for a high grade. One manager sent me a fragment of a condensing lens he had paid $2 for. I make no pretense to expertness in judging lenses, but even the novice could see it was a very poor quality of lens, probably one retailing for 75 cents. The high-class lens, being made more carefully and of better materials has, or should have, more even density, therefore withstanding the shock of expansion and contraction better. The glass does not have the greenish tinge present in the cheaper lenses and therefore yields a considerably whiter light. More than this, they are much more accurately ground and for that reason give a greater amount of light at the aperture plate for a given arc strength. To sum up: The high-grade lenses give a whiter, stronger light and do not break quite so readily, though they will break, as will any glass subjected to rapid and extreme expansion and contraction. When the condensing lens fits into a metal round it should fit loosely, with fully 1-16 inch play. The glass expands more in diameter than does the metal round and if the fit is snug when cold the round will bind and may crack the glass when heated. If your lens is too large you can easily grind it down on a coarse grindstone. An emery wheel, unless very fine and low speed, will chip the edges badly. You cannot tell when a condenser is dirty (unless very dirty) simply by looking through it. Look through the casing vent holes when the arc is burning and if the lens looks foggy it is dirty and needs cleaning. The outside you will, of course, polish thoroughly every day before starting the run. Lenses may be cleaned by wiping with a wet cloth or breathing on them, polishing afterward with soft, dry cloth or chamois. Wood alcohol is best, however, for the purpose. Wet (not dampen, but wet) a bit of cloth with alcohol and wash the lens off with it, polishing quickly, before the alcohol evaporates, with soft, dry cloth or chamois. Keep the alcohol tightly corked, as it evaporates very rapidly. Don't keep alcohol in the operating room. In case of fire it would help things along amazingly. As to the distance the condensing lens should be from the film; the writer considers 12 inches about right, but has been unable to see that a variation of an inch either way makes any material difference, though under certain circumstances he has been able to remove a "ghost" (dark spot in center of curtain) by moving the lamp house forward or back. As to the matter of condenser breakage the writer does not feel justified in saying much more than has already been said. He has a grave suspicion (may be all wrong, though) that up to a certain degree of heat there is small danger of breakage, other things being right, but when that point is passed the danger is very largely increased. He has about come to the conclusion that this, fitting lenses too tightly in metal rounds, and very sudden changes in temperature, due to excessive heat in lamphouse, are the three causes responsible for nine-tenths of all condenser breakage. Where condensing lenses of the same focal length are used front and back the writer believes danger of breakage is materially reduced if when putting in a new lens it be placed in front, the old lens being moved to the rear next the light. He believes a lens that has been used in front for some time has become "seasoned" (I use that term for want of a better), so that it will stand the comparatively severe service next the lamp better than will a new one. This may be imagination, pure and simple, but—try it out, anyhow.

That condenser breakage is a serious item of expense in many cases is proven by the fact that the writer has received more than five hundred letters from managers and operators, during the past year alone, on this very subject.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

When I said last week that the hot weather played havoc with the receipts of the picture houses I most positively had in view a revival of business with a lowering of the temperature. Present conditions clearly demonstrate that the hot spell dealt a solar plexus blow to the business from which recovery will be exceedingly slow. The open-air places show an improvement. Those of the other places that closed will in all probability remain closed for the balance of the Summer and the numbers are being increased daily. The managers of indoor places that appear contented with the business they are doing are very scarce. Complaints of poor business are heard in all quarters and it is safe to say that at least forty per cent. of the nickelodeons that were open on June 1 now have closed doors, not being able to get receipts that come within a reasonable margin of the expenses required to keep the places open, notwithstanding many of them cut out vaudeville, illustrated songs, and otherwise cut down the weekly payroll to reduce expenses to a minimum. These conditions are perhaps more noticeable than during preceding Summer seasons, for the reason that, with the aid of electric fans, additional ventilation, etc., more nickelodeons started in this year to fight out the Summer season than ever before. The experiment has been a costly one to many and it is a certainty that, no matter how popular the pictures may be during the Fall and Winter, with the advent of next Summer the "closed for the season" billboards will be very plentiful.

I traveled considerably among the film exchanges during the past week and found a great falling off in business. Where trade is held it is accomplished almost invariably by big cuts in the rental prices, it being understood, of course, that when the regular season opens the old schedule of prices will be restored. Even this concession has failed to tide the exhibitors over the crisis. One of the oldest film renters in the business told me the other day that he never knew of any period when exhibitors were getting more for their money than at the present time. The closing of so many places has left the renters with an unusually large stock of subjects on hand from which the exhibitors may draw a supply and they are permitted to name their own price and select their subjects almost without restriction. One seldom hears "first run" mentioned these days. Of course, brand new subjects are still held at a premium, but there has been a wonderful change on this score during the past three weeks. The exchanges working under the Motion Picture Patents Company license have a hard struggle. They are obliged to purchase a certain quantity of new subjects each month. If they do not do so, they run the risk of having their licenses revoked on the ground that they are not legitimate film exchanges. It is puzzling to me how some of them keep up the purchases, especially when the exhibitors, almost as a whole, find it impossible to pay first run prices. It has been explained that the salvation lies in the willingness of the exhibitors still in business to take films that have already paid for themselves, in consideration of the reduced rates. All revenue from these films is what may be called "velvet," and this velvet helps to counterbalance the expense incurred in the buying of new subjects. An expert in the business tells me this is true, but the counterbalancing process leaves the exchange without profit. The exchange men are playing the same game as the exhibitors—fighting out the Summer in the hope that the Fall and Winter will make good all losses. I am fully convinced of the truthfulness of any exchange man who at present says he is running his business at a loss. I do not think there is an exchange—licensed or independent—that is covering expenses. Some may dispute this on the theory that the advantage given the exchanges in being able to get their old films into use is a profit builder; but it should be remembered that there is a certain percentage of picture theaters that are enabled to remain open all the year and to hold these places the exchanges serving them must continue buying new films, which eats a big hole in the profits made on the rental of old films.

Bad as conditions are in New York, they are still far better than those in the State of Pennsylvania. The situation there is in a most serious condition owing to a recent regulation that requires picture houses to have three aisles, each four feet in width. Scores of managers have been obliged to close their places because they have found it utterly impossible to comply with the regulation. The average nickelodeon has but one aisle, the seating capacity being on each side of it. Take twelve feet in width from these places for aisle room and you will find an awfully cut down of the seating capacity. Several managers have shown by figures that to comply with the regulation will so far reduce the seating capacity as to make the receipts practically little above expenses and compel a permanent closing up of places. A hard fight is being made to prevent the enforcement of the regulation, or at least secure some modification of it. I met a Pennsylvania friend the other day and he said he believed the regulation would be enforced with a view to closing up the small picture places. He expressed the opinion that as fast as the small ones are closed larger places will be opened. Eventually picture shows in store-rooms will become a thing of the past and such places of entertainment will be theaters in reality as well as in name.

The surviving body of the Film Service Association, which was such a power in the picture field prior to the coming of the Patents Company, has given indication of real life. As a business organization the Patents Company knocked it out with one blow, last Winter. It is revived and its members decided to keep it alive as a social organization. It has remained practically dormant since last February. Next week the members will pull themselves together and assemble at Atlantic City for a three or four days' session. They are going to dig up reminiscences and tell each other what they think of the future as bearing upon the renter and exhibitor. It should be an interesting gathering. I should wish to be there and hear some of the addresses. There are some very clever men in the bunch, and as it will be practically the first gathering of the renters since they became allied with the Patents Company some of these men will no doubt be well primed with ideas. I understand the sessions will be attended by exchange men from all parts of the States. Assurances are given that there is nothing antagonistic in the movement. The chief object is to have a reunion of the exchange people, heal some old sores and formulate plans for more serious and material co-operation during the next Fall and Winter season. In the language of one of the members who is taking an active interest in the arrangements, it will be a love feast.

Has anything gone wrong with the non-inflammable film? There is an ominous silence regarding it. I expected to hear a blare of trumpets when the much talked of and looked for article was put on the market. Dame Rumor says there is a defect somewhere. It is quite certain that it is not being used as extensively as was expected. The manufacturers are mum on the subject. When pressed for an explanation they say it has not yet been made in sufficient quantities.

OLIVER.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

Mr. R. L. Welch, manager of the Theato of Richmond, Va., starts on an automobile tour on Thursday, July 15th, and will be accompanied by his wife and family and Mr. R. P. Schilling. The tour is through to Indianapolis, Ind. Mr. Welch expects to make Charlottesville and Staunton, Va., the first day, Hagarstown and Cumberland, Md., the second day, Johnstown, Pa., the third day, Pittsburg the fourth day, Columbus, Ohio, the fifth day, Springfield the sixth day, and is due to arrive in Indianapolis on the seventh day.

Mr. Welch's tour is not against time, but is for pleasure only. Indianapolis being his home, he will remain there for about one week and will return via Toledo, Cleveland, Detroit, through Canada to Niagara Falls, Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, Utica, New York City, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and back to Richmond. He expects to make the return trip in better time than the one going. The car that Mr. Welch will use is his own and is a Cadillac, thirty horsepower.

A great deal of interest is being manifested in this trip owing to the fact that many of the owners of heavier machines claim that he cannot climb the hills in many places between here and Pittsburg. During Mr. Welch's absence from Richmond the Theato, owned by him, on Broad and Fifth streets, will be entirely remodeled. The stage will be enlarged and a new front put in, together with interior decorations that promise to make the Theato one of the prettiest vaudeville houses on Broad street.

Mr. Welch has many friends in Richmond who will no doubt give him a great send off when he leaves as well as a rousing reception upon his return.

The Machine Branch Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., of New York and vicinity, requests all operators to co-operate with said union. For information regarding same, address Secretary, Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., Gallagher's Hall, 402 Eighth avenue, New York City.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

In recent weeks I have listened very carefully to some of the lecturers of the New York moving picture theaters. It would be flattery to say that they could not be improved upon. They could. And yet in strict justice there is no technical fault to find with them. They speak their books correctly, their pronunciation is distinct and they seem to be audible all over the house. These, of course, are the leading essentials in a lecturer at a moving picture theater, or, indeed, in any other public hall.

Is this enough? Does not the average moving picture audience nowadays look for something more than mere academic excellence? I think they do. Before I venture to point out what I think they are looking for, let us consider for a moment the exact relationship of a short lecture, or, indeed, any other kind of lecture, to the moving picture entertainment as a whole. The lecture is, of course, a part, as the illustrated song slide is a part, or the vaudeville act a part. The vaudeville act I rule out of consideration, because, to my idea, it belongs to the regular stage and not to the moving picture stage. Both the lecture and the song slide, however, have some direct photographic interest. They are the relief, as it were, the stationary photographic relief to the moving photograph. One kind of photography is contrasted with, or rather against, the other.

And this is the whole fault of the various lectures that are put on at New York moving picture theaters. You have good pictures illustrative of distant countries, but, as a rule, the lecturer employed talks, though he talks well, as if he were reading from a guide book. There is no action, there is no fire, there is no expression, in brief, there is nothing of the man himself in what he says. It is all the difference between the educated parrot and the natural orator. One merely repeats certain formulæ in the mechanical fashion, the other infuses into what he says a wealth of action, gesture, force, fire and what we commonly understand by the term, personality.

This, then, is what is needed in the lectures given to moving picture theaters. We need personality. The lecturer who is popular will attract people to the house very often. At the present time he often assists to empty it. Maybe this is a subtle point of policy on the part of the management. Perhaps they want their houses repeatedly emptied and repeatedly filled. People, I notice—and I have noticed it this very week—seem to go into a moving picture theater to sleep. Others, again, to sit off the effects of too much alcohol. Only this week I have seen sleeping persons aroused by the ushers. Once I had the misfortune to be surrounded by an atmosphere of alcohol which was so thick that you could almost cut it with a knife. This is not the sort of thing that you want in a moving picture theater.

There is no reason why a good lecture should not form, as it were, a headliner in a moving picture programme. There is no reason why instead of lecturing to merely a collection of travelogue slides he should not lecture to or with specially made films. Not merely by way of introduction to the film or as a descriptive accompaniment to it, but dramatically and as a complement or supplement to the picture. In other words, he should supply the vocal symphony, so to speak, to the silent picture. I offer the suggestion in the hope that some enterprising moving picture theaters will try the experiment.

The idea, of course, is carried out in one way by the humanoscope, where you have talking or singing actors and actresses behind the screen while the picture is in progress. Then you get what seems to be a regular act. I notice that the Majestic Theater, on Columbus Circle, is featuring the humanoscope. When this is well done the audience are quick to appreciate it. Of course when it is badly done disaster is the result. The idea is capable of great development both behind and before the screen. Certainly the lecturing end is one that clearly calls for closer attention. For if we are to have lectures, let them be lectures in the very highest sense of the term, and not merely mechanically repeated extracts from guide books which make us yawn or send us out of the theater.

Of course the gentle reader will see from this that many ideas in regard to the conduct of moving picture theaters are surging through the always active brain of Lux Graphicus. Those ideas spring from the question that is ever present, not only in my mind but in many other minds. Which is this: Which is the best way to run a moving picture theater? What should the entertainment consist of? What do the public like best and most? That is the point. Having ascertained the public's preferences it seems to me merely a matter of routine to serve up an entertainment that will insure the perpetual patronage of our great masters and mistresses —the public. I submit that one way in which to attract that patronage is to engage good lecturers on good subjects.

Nobody at present is doing this. That is to say, nobody at present is presenting lecturers of sufficient ability who in themselves would constitute a decided attraction to moving picture theaters. Where any one attraction of a moving picture theater is not in the highest class then the average quality of the entertainment falls, and the public does not put in an appearance so largely as it otherwise might. Give the public of your best and in return the public will give you their best. And their best is, of course, frequency of attendance and the gratifying contributions of their nickels and dimes.

ACCURACY IN INDIAN SUBJECTS.

By Wild West.

A very fine picture was presented to the public recently, through the enterprise of a company that is making rapid strides toward the topmost round of the ladder of success. It was a very good picture, not only from an educational and historical standpoint but from many others. Yet for all that, to the trained eye, quite a few prominent defects stood out. I will not go too deeply into details, but will only say that the next time that the little squaws appear in a picture I hope that they won't leave the tepee in such haste as to forget their belts, for hardly ever do you see a squaw without her belt, and especially when she is on such an important mission as to bid her loved ones good-bye. If they had only brought their belts along and left or forgotten to bring those stagy actions along, why, it would have been much better. Indian maidens are known to be of a sedate and pensive character. But, of course, they are to be excused if they were the daughters of the brave chief, who displayed so much agony when being burned at the stake. That is another thing: no Indian (?) shows his agony when being tortured by an enemy. The bravest Indian is the one that stands the most punishment; but it may be like everything else: following in his white brothers' footsteps he has forgotten that. Now, little squaws, you and your chief have a little talk before starting out on your next journey, for pictures of that kind are what we need, but be a little more accurate, as they are of much value to those seeking knowledge on such subjects.

LAEMMLE COMES TO NEW YORK.

The esteemed contemporary, whose melancholy mission it is to persuade its readers that the film renter is a superfluous factor in the moving picture business to-day, should take a little walking exercise along East Fourteenth street, where, if he will cast his eyes up to the large first floor of No. 111 of that eclectic thoroughfare, that is next door to the Steinway Piano Building, he will see something to give him more food for thought. For Carl Laemmle, the most criticized, the most derided, and most objugated Laemmle, has plunged right into the heart of the center of things in moving picturedom, and has opened a film exchange in New York City. This is a little bit of the argumentum ad homenum kind of dialectical pabulem which our esteemed contemporary at No. 1 Madison avenue, New York, can digest at his leisure. In other and simpler words, an ounce of practice is worth a ton of theory. The premises taken by Carl Laemmle are large and well appointed, and when they have passed out of the hands of the decorators and are quite ready for business, will be found to be an ideal location for doing a large film renting trade. As we have said, they are in the very center of things, for Fourteenth street, New York, probably does more in the way of film selling and showing than any other thoroughfare in the world. The New York branch of the Laemmle Film Service is in the able hands of Mr. T. D. Cochrane, who, we are sure, will make a great success of the branch, as to experience of what is required in the business, he adds great energy and commercial ability.

The Art Lantern Slide Company is now located in its new studio apartment at 1263 Broadway and extend a cordial invitation to the trade to call on them. With their increased help and floor space they are now in position to compete with the best in their line, and would like to get in correspondence with a few first-class illustrated song models.

PRACTICAL UTILITY OF MOVING PICTURES.

A Concrete Example.

F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

Never was the real practical utility of moving pictures better shown than in the case of the recent auto races at Crown Point, Ind. These races were run within twenty miles of the corporate limits of Chicago, were very exciting and full of intense interest, yet not one in ten thousand of the citizens even of this city could view them. The course had many sharp, dangerous turns and the race was replete with exciting incidents, few of which were viewed even by the people who did go to Crown Point and swelter in the hot sun all day long, returning with blistered faces minus quite a respectable chunk of coin of the realm. But the incidents they missed they have seen. They have viewed them in all the vividness of their actuality days after the race was but a matter of history. How?

Simplicity itself! The Selig Company had a corps of men stationed around the twenty-three mile course at all points where there was most likely to be high speed, accidents or other things of more than passing interest, and it is simply amazing what they secured. Even myself, an old picture man, could scarce believe my eyes when I viewed the film at the Orpheum. At one of the bad turns a car skidded and turned squarely end for end. It is almost unbelievable that the camera could catch this incident, but there it is, every detail of it, and at close range at that. There is no manner of doubt about its being genuine either. No driver on earth would risk his life, to say nothing of the great, heavy racing car, to accommodate a motion picture man, no matter how much money he might be offered. And so it comes to pass that tens of thousands of people here in Chicago, not to mention millions in other cities, may view the very best features of this race comfortably and at their ease and for a total cost of just a few cents. Who will deny that such things prove that moving pictures have a real value to the community and a fundamental worth almost beyond computing in that they allow the public at large to view passing events of national interest even though separated from the actual theater of action by thousands of miles.

And now let me speak of another matter in this connection. There are certain national events of which films should be made, either through arrangement with some film maker or else directly by the government itself. To put the cart ahead of the horse and illustrate my point before I make it: suppose it were discovered that some genius had, unknown to all, discovered and perfected a motion picture apparatus in the time of Washington or Lincoln and a negative film were found, the genuineness of which was beyond doubt, of the inauguration of either of the above named men. How much would you be willing to give to view it? I venture to say that millions would not begrudge five dollars and tens of thousands would willingly pay twenty times that amount. But aside from the future value to posterity of a motion picture film of the inauguration of Presidents we people of to-day would like to view such state affairs, and now that it is entirely practical it is no more than the plain duty of the government, it seems to me, to provide the means. Considerable of the public monies are expended in preparing for the inauguration and it does no one a particle of good except those who are wealthy enough to go to the Capital or who already reside there. But by proper arrangement it is quite possible for every man, woman and child to view not only the pageant but the actual inauguration itself. In view of this I repeat that it is the duty of the government to make adequate arrangements for motion picture films of all the details of the inauguration, especially the act itself. The matter would seem of sufficient importance for Congressional action ordering some such suitable arrangement made at all future inaugurations.

MUNSEY'S MAGAZINE AND MOVING PICTURES.

Mr. William Allen Johnston contributes to the August number of "Munsey's" a lengthy article on the manufacture and uses of moving pictures that will be of great interest to the lay reader. The illustrations are elaborately worked out in four colors, a remarkable feat in itself in a magazine having such a large circulation. We cannot help but remark that the author of the article has drawn largely from the Moving Picture World for his facts, which he has arranged in a style that is interesting to the public and calculated to increase their attendance at the silent shows. He has drawn upon his own imagination in his reference to the two competing "combines" in the field, but it is clear to us that these combines, even if they are not as heavily capitalized as Standard Oil, are responsible for bringing this business into such prominence as to command six pages in a national magazine like "Munsey's."

Comments on the Week's Films.

THE BLACK SHEEP (Essanay).

Scenes in the "wheat pit" have figured in many a novel for, as Mr. James Patten's recent exploits bear witness, they have all the elements of gambling and excitement, with their attendant gains and losses, and underlying them, the strong human interest of it all. The Essanay Company, therefore, shrewdly select a scene in the wheat pit as the climax of this ambitious film, in the course of which it comes as a great dramatic surprise. The author of the story evidently has a strong appreciation of effective situations, for he leads up to this climax quite naturally and without apparent effort.

The story of the picture shows the contrast in character between two sons. Very early the somewhat reckless tendencies of one of them has developed, and when, after a bacchanalian night in a restaurant with accommodating ladies of the demi-monde, he is turned out of home by his father and mother and spurned by his "goody goody" brother, we knew that we had got through the prologue of an exciting piece of drama. So, for the time being, the black sheep disappears. And there is an interval of twenty years, during which period the other brother has become a Wall Street magnate. Enter to him his poor father and mother, who are in need of financial help. The good son offers them a small coin which is indignantly rejected, and the parents of the Wall Street financier are obliged to seek the refuge of the poorhouse. Meanwhile, the black sheep, as black sheep often do, has become a Colorado millionaire. The story of his brother's ingratitude is public property. So the Colorado millionaire makes his way to his brother and is turned down with scorn. But strong in his determination to bring his brother to brook, he enters the wheat pit in Chicago where his brother is a speculator. In that pit we see the two brothers bitterly opposed to one another in the game of speculation. The scene is one of great excitement, and finally the Colorado man beggars his brother at the game. All that is now left for him to do is to rescue his parents from the poorhouse, and in a final scene we witness a pathetic recognition and restoration of happiness.

It is greatly to the credit of the Essanay Company that they tell this excellent story so clearly and vividly that the audience is enabled to follow it without effort or doubt. The acting in the piece is exceedingly good and convincing and the photography of it all that could be desired. It is certainly the most ambitious comedy subject that the Essanay people have attempted, and we think that they have succeeded remarkably well in their work. We noticed that it was followed with breathless interest by the audience who saw it when we did. All through the acting of the old people and the bad brother was very effective, whilst the good brother was thoroughly manly and earnest. The wheat pit scene was full of excitement and movement. "The Black Sheep" is a great Essanay success.

TUNISIAN INDUSTRIES (Pathe).

In the pages of The Moving Picture World stress has been laid upon the value of the moving picture camera for recording various industries and the method of their carrying out in detail. It would seem that Pathes as well as ourselves recognize the value of the moving picture in this respect. They have gone to the French protectorate of Tunis and have shown us the inhabitants of North Africa who work in their own particular Oriental manner. There are characteristic Oriental groupings, costumes and domestic architecture to be seen in the film. Interest centers in the work of rug weaving, rope making, basket making, sieve making, copper working, all of which industries are shown in the progress of this film. We noticed, that the film attracted the earnest attention of the audience who witnessed it. Obviously, therefore, industrial subjects of this nature come as a relief to more dramatic themes which form the staple of moving picture theater entertainments.

THE PRETTY FISHER MAIDEN (Eclipse).

The fates are favorably disposed to Mr. Kleine just now, for he is getting a run of subjects which are of exceedingly high quality and manifestly please audiences to whom they are shown. "The Pretty Fisher Maiden" is as fine a piece of photography as we have recently seen, naturally acted, beautifully and evenly illuminated and forming a series of stage photographs of unsurpassed pictorial quality. Indeed, in this latter respect we have not recently seen a better piece of richer toned positive work. Then, again, it is so well dressed and the scenes are so admirably chosen that it constitutes a feast of richness to the eye. The scene, of course, is laid in a French fisher village. You see a group of French fisher folks at work, and the beauties of a somewhat attractive girl enlist the attention of a man living in the neighborhood, but his wife surprises him in his attentions to the girl and bribes a man to turn the girl adrift in the sea. This is done. But, fortunately, the girl, after many adventures out at sea, is rescued, and so the piece ends with this note of interrogation. The simplicity of the story conveys no adequate idea of its fine dramatic treatment, and above all things of the splendid manner in which the various scenes have been photographed. These, as we have said, are splendid pieces of work which makes "The Pretty Fisher Maiden" well worth studying from the pictorial photographic standpoint alone. "The Pretty Fisher Maiden" is another success for Urban-Eclipse.

A TRAGIC ENDING OF SHROVE TUESDAY (Pathe).

We doubt if American audiences will quite understand this title, which, we think, is not aptly chosen. Shrove Tuesday is the day immediately before Ash Wednesday. It is the eve of Lent, and consequently, with forty days' fast in front of them, European people are accustomed to make carnival on that day—the masked ball and other diversions are therefore popular. Into this custom the Pathes have conveyed a very pretty and a very humane story. One of the revelers makes love to a pretty girl, and is discovered by his wife. To be revenged the wife disguises herself as a man and also makes love to the girl. The husband discovers the pair, challenges the man and kills him, only to discover before the man's death that it is his own wife who is his victim. The dying woman forgives him in her last moments as the revelers respectfully stand around. This is a colored picture which is richly dressed and well acted by the Pathe performers, and the story greatly interested the audience. The only fault we have to find with it, however, is in this somewhat ill-chosen title. Had one more germane to the subject been chosen the film, we think, would be more popular.

"THE COUNTRY DOCTOR" (Biograph).

The heart dramas which have come from the Biograph studio have been numerous, but perhaps none has been stronger, nor has there been one which has made the profound impression which is made by this one. Ordinarily the gloom which accompanies death seems needless in a picture play, but where a drama teaches a great moral truth as this ones does, perhaps it should be accepted as indicating the right view of life rather than as an amusement. It is difficult to select any one scene as typifying the tremendous struggle in the doctor's soul as he leaves his own child, ill unto death, to attend the child of a poor woman, also dangerously ill. Nature's noblemen are none too numerous, and yet, if the accumulation of noble deeds typified in this film could all be gathered in one sheaf, what a mighty power for good they would become. It is heartrending, that last scene, when the doctor leaves the bedside of the sick child, happy in the consciousness that he has performed his duty and has carried her safely over the crisis, only to find that his own loved daughter has died for want of his care. One doesn't like to think of it, and yet above all the sorrow and despair there arises the thought that he did his duty, as he saw it, and though the result was bitter, still he could do nothing else, and that alone is his consolation. With good photography and staging and the superb acting of the Biograph company this drama develops a power that is certain to make it a growing influence wherever it is shown. Such pictures will go far toward answering the many criticisms which have been applied to moving pictures by those who apparently never took the trouble to investigate and see what the leading companies are turning out every day.

"A Great Wrong Righted."—This Lubin picture tells the old story of unwise love and desertion because one girl had no money and another did. But it has the novelty of seeing the reunion of the former lovers through their child, who helps her mother by selling flowers and discovers in a saloon a man who is about to commit suicide. This proves to be her own father, and through her the lovers are reunited and the man marries the child's mother. Only so far as these stories have a perennial interest is there any particular interest in this one. But the acting is good and the tale, as it unfolds, does grip the heart, which is, perhaps, the final test of anything of this type. If a story can be told in such a way that it appeals to the heart of the audience it is good enough to be popular everywhere. The acting is quite up to the standard of Lubin's actors, and the technical quality of the film is satisfactory. This will undoubtedly be popular, because it tells a story which is common enough and because it appeals to the great heart of humanity.

"A Child's Love."—A Pathe film which tells of a man's double life and how a child brought him to a realizing sense of his false position. In this instance there is additional interest because the woman whom the man was visiting possessed a high sense of honor and refused to see him after her discovery through his child's visit that he was married. The acting is good and the work of the child as she makes her way into the presence of the actress and defiantly reveals her identity is excellent, exciting very strong interest in the audience. The technical qualities of the film are good.

"The Spanish Army."—A Pathe picture which gives some illustrations of different phases in the life of the Spanish army. This picture gives a clear idea of several of the important points in a Spanish soldier's life and deserves a long run because of its educational character. The technical quality of the film is quite up to the Pathe standard.

"Up the Ladder with Tom Bowline."—The Edison studio has achieved an unusual success in this film representing various scenes in the life of a naval officer from his enlistment until he receives his commission as a commander, or whatever else he may be aiming at. The principal point of interest about this film is that the naval department granted permission to use the government ships and the government officers and men wherever necessary and numerous little touches of naval life are introduced which have never before been shown in public. To obtain this permission was almost as much of a success as it was to make the picture in such an excellent manner. It is a picture of the navy by naval officers and men and is correct in every detail while the scenes where are shown several hundred officers and men are extremely interesting. Everybody is interested in the navy, and this film, with its high technical quality and its powerful appeal to patriotic pride, ought to be one of the most popular the Edison people have ever put out. It is not necessary to describe it in detail. Practically everyone will enjoy it, merely because it is true to the life of the navy and represents actual scenes therein. The little love story that is interwoven adds zest to the picture and makes it seem like a page from the life of an actual man.

"The Coin Collector."—A Gaumont film which develops some novel and very interesting magic features. A collector is seated before his trunk of treasures and falls into a doze. The coins of ancient mintage appear one by one, and following them come scenes typifying life at the period the coin represents. The picture is beautifully colored and its magic effects are pleasing.

"Raised in the Country."—A Gaumont comedy which illustrates the stimulating effect of life in the country upon a little one left in the care of a farmer's family. It requires some powerful electric currents to restore the child to normal size again. The picture is well worked out and is humorous, a merit which will be acknowledged as well worth having in instances of this sort.

"Led Astray."—The Vitagraph Company have given a very graphic reproduction of the well-known melodrama, "East Lynne," in this film. The play is so well known that it requires no detailed explanation to make it plain, but one must commend the actors, who have made "East Lynne" live upon the screen. And these actors are not the barnstorming sort who go roving about the country presenting "East Lynne" to audiences in small towns. They are finished players, and the popular old story assumes an added interest from its presentation by them. The acting of Isabel is perhaps the best, though Barbara is good, although Carlisle is not so successful in developing his part. The whole picture is pleasing, if a drama which ends with death and gloom can be called pleasing. But perhaps one should not criticise a play which has appealed to thousands of people of every type and station for many years and never fails to bring the tears. If the play, as it is commonly shown, is so powerful, surely this motion picture, with every individual a capable and well-trained actor, ought to be even more interesting, and the play should receive a fresh lease of life and interest yet other thousands who have never seen it. The Vitagraph Company should be a little more attentive to details. The wind blew so strong in a supposed "interior" that the draperies stood out straight and the eagle trademark fluttered down from the wall. Succeeding titles such as "After Five Years," or "After Ten Years," we would expect to see some facial change in the actors, or at least a different suit of clothes.

"The Dramatist's Dream."—A picture from the Vitagraph studio which might be accepted by would-be dramatists and authors as a warning of their probable fate in attempting to woo the uncertain success of a writer. Probably more than one has had just such a dream and a similar rude awakening. The fact that the dramatist decides that he will tear up the whole thing and throw it away adds zest to the picture. Technically the film is good and the acting is satisfactory.

"The Necklace."—Vanity is unquestionably a vice that should be crushed the moment its presence is discovered, and perhaps this axiom was never more forcibly presented than in this picture from the Biograph studio. The story is worked out with the fidelity to detail and the snap and dash for which the Biograph players are noted. The acting, too, is good, while the technical quality of the film, except in a few places, is up to the standard set by the Biograph mechanical department. Whether the moral lesson taught in sending these two people to their death because of their vanity is worth the elaborate work done on this film is a question which will be decided differently by different people, and perhaps the real answer to it will lie in the impression the story makes on the varying types of people who see it. The picture holds the attention of the audience throughout and the interest at the two climaxes, the first when the theft is discovered, and the next when the real worth of the stolen property is made known to the two who have slaved for years to pay for the lost jewels, is intense. It is but natural that both should die at the end. It could scarcely be otherwise, but this makes the picture another of those which is like a shroud.

"The Old Army Chest" (Lubin).—War and its memories are often the subjects of romance and the tales of love which are told with war or some of its accompaniments as a background are numerous. In this picture from Lubin an old and revered flag, folded close in an army chest, is made the inspiration which causes a father to grant the hand of his daughter to a recently graduated cadet. Quite the most interesting feature is the reproduction of the scenes through which the retired warrior passed as he takes one article after another from the chest, and there is a burst of applause as the plea of the old battle-torn flag wins the young man's plea. Technically the film is good, except unsteadiness in some parts, and it seems unreal for the old colonel to be so long unaware of the presence of two people but a few feet away.

"Ben's Kid."—A Selig Western drama which has all the go for which these dramas have become popular and which is reproduced with fidelity to the life and environment depicted. The scene where the mother is forced to leave the little one behind is almost too realistic, and when the camp is informed of the circumstance the audience responds to the miners' attempts to straighten out the tangle. Then when the mother mounts her pony and starts back, with her cruel husband in hot pursuit, the audience holds its breath as it watches the race. What was done to the husband is agreed to be no more than he deserved, but, fortunately, the audience is spared the actual scene, which is as it should be. The imagination in most individuals is powerful enough to appreciate what is done under such circumstances without having the scene enacted before them. And the end is happy. Withal it is a satisfactory picture, having ample life and animation to satisfy the most exacting individual.

"The Phantom Sirens."—An Eclipse picture possessing beautiful photographic and scenic qualities, but telling a rather weak story. It has no especially strong features, but seems to be only mediocre throughout so far as dramatic interest is concerned. To send a number of fishermen to a picturesque island to discover phantom sirens has some merit as an original conception, and to substitute the smitten young men's sweethearts for the sirens with the hope of winning back the lovers is in a degree original. Even though it has no particular strength the story at least is not gloomy, and that should commend it to audiences which are fond of amusement and not funeral gloom. Photographically the film is unusually beautiful. The scenery is picturesque and the tone values are unusually well maintained. The film runs very smooth. There is scarcely a tremble from beginning to end.

"Rulers of the World."—An Urban film which gives portraits of a number of the rulers of the world, including President Taft. And by the way, his portrait never got a hand. It was formerly different when the President's picture appeared on the screen.

"Psyche."—When the Pathes undertake the illustration of some mythological fable or some other feature of that character a good film is certain. In this free rendering of the mythological tale of Psyche the success is not so pronounced, perhaps because the story itself is less familiar than some of the others, and even when one remembers the story there are passages that seem obscure. An example is shown where Psyche is blindfolded. Unless the story is remembered fully it is uncertain why her eyes are bound up. The discovery of Psyche asleep in the palace is equally uncertain in the rendering. As a whole, however, the picture is successful and adds another to that list of films d'art which is constantly lengthening. While the acting is not as strong and convincing as it is in some of the films of this character which have been previously issued it is, perhaps, as convincing as the subject requires. Psyche, the principal character, is good in most places, though there is nothing in the action of the character which appeals to one as above the ordinary. The story is not displeasing as shown, however, and the only critical observation one cares to make is to express the belief that films like this are not understood by a majority of those who see them, and to say that this picture is probably no more to practically all audiences than a series of artistic figure groupings and a development of scenic beauty.

"Washington Under the American Flag."—This film from the Vitagraph studio is a companion to "Washington Under the British Flag," which was noted previously, and it is, if anything, better than the other. The first left Washington at his marriage to Martha Custis. This begins with the convening of the Congress in Philadelphia where Patrick Henry's famous oration fired the whole nation. The acceptance of the command of the Continental Army. Then come Valley Forge, the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, Washington as President, and the closing scene, showing him at his home in Mt. Vernon surrounded by his household. While there are slight historic faults in this film it deserves the highest commendation. The two should be shown successively, thus giving a connected account of Washington's life in pictorial form. The actors, especially the one who impersonates Washington in the last reel, deserve praise for the uniformly dignified character of their work. As a whole this ambitious effort of the Vitagraph people is a success. No better films could be shown during the Independence Day season, and they cannot fail to inspire courage and patriotism wherever shown. In the large cities where many who see the motion pictures know very little of the history of this country, a picture of this character assumes an educational value quite apart from its entertaining features. These efforts of leading manufacturers deserve encouragement. Surely the history of this country has numerous characters sufficiently romantic to make interesting and educating pictures. More of this work could be done, and more should be done.

"Parted on Their Honeymoon."—An Edison film which is certain to please because it depicts certain entertaining aspects of childhood in an entirely original way. The children go through a marriage ceremony for fun, but when it is over the couple, aged about eight, take the matter seriously and start on a honeymoon in a cart drawn by a goat. They disappear in the wilderness, but are sought out and soundly spanked by their exasperated mothers. To the youngsters the story's ending is not so amusing as it is to the audience. The conception is original, the quality of the film is such that it is a perpetual delight, hence there is nothing to do but laugh and enjoy it, and that the audience does enjoy it goes without saying. It is one of those original comedies from the Edison studio which puts any audience in good humor and proves what has so often been pointed out before, that there is plenty of good, clean fun without resorting to anything vulgar or suggestive.

"He Wouldn't Go Under a Ladder."—An Edison comedy based on the old superstition that bad luck is handed out to the unfortunate individual who deliberately, or carelessly, walks under a ladder. But in this picture Sam is cured of his superstition by having it shown him that bad luck sometimes comes to the man who avoids walking under a ladder. To prove his freedom from superstition at last, Sam goes out and deliberately walks back under a ladder a number of times; and this dogged determination to overcome the influence of ladders is quite the funniest portion of the film. The technical quality is good and the film creates much sport.

"The Bogey Woman."—A magic film from the Pathes which is certain to please the children, and through them interest the old people. To conceive of a bogey woman transforming children into vegetables is a unique conception, and the way it is carried out is very convincing. The brave little fellow who starts out with the determination to rescue his transformed brother and sister wins the sympathy of the audience, and they are disposed to applaud him when he receives assistance from a fairy and goes forth to conquer. And the denoument when he succeeds in restoring the children is pleasant, while the dissolution of the bogey completes a good fairy story.

"Fun with a Manikin."—A Pathe picture which makes a manikin its hero by leaving him to settle a bill for dinner, and when he is seized and thrown out and everyone discovers the deception some droll situations are developed. The film is a good one and is funny enough to break the monotony in a too heavy programme.

"The Hand Bell."—A Gaumont which introduces magic in the shape of a hand bell presented to a gentleman by a fairy. He is able to satisfactorily surmount every difficulty by its aid, except to overcome his mother-in-law. Discouraged, he discards the bell, only to have it used against him. Technically the film is good, but is only mildly amusing. As a break in a heavy programme it will achieve some success.

"Sunny South of France."—A Gaumont which shows interesting pictures of Old Marseille, St. Raphael, Cannes, Antibes, Nice, Beaulieu, Monte Carlo and Mentone. In the main these pictures are good and afford a reasonably accurate idea of the towns illustrated.

"An Inspiring Sunset."—A Pathe film in which the glories of a sunset seen across the water are graphically shown. The film has achieved a success in this difficult reproduction which it would be difficult to duplicate. Anyone who has attempted to transfer to a sensitive film the fleeting changes of a sunset, retaining at the same time some of its delicate glories, knows what must be overcome in preparing a film of this character. And those who have tried, and perhaps have failed, will be most emphatic in their praise of the success of this effort of the Pathes. It is well worth seeing both as a picture and as an example of successful manipulation of mechanical contrivances which have serious limitations.

"Determined Wooer."—A Pathe which tells the story of a wooer who tried all sorts of expedients to be near the girl he loved, though her parents objected, and who finally won by his very persistency. It has some funny situations and, as a whole, would pass for a funny film.

"Comrades' Rations."—Seen at an independent theater and without a manufacturer's mark. It is an attempt to be funny by sending a gawky soldier after rations for his comrades. He spills them in the street and the fun is apparently supposed to lie in what occurs and what they find when they begin to eat. Technically the film is poor and in no sense is it up to the standard. Whoever made it better experiment some more before attempting to create a comedy.

"Room Mates."—A comedy from Lubin which illustrates the pranks of two boys in a way that is sure to please. The fun is clean and genuine and the jokes are unusually funny. Lubin has the faculty of producing something funny whenever he undertakes it, and this film is quite as successful as previous ones have been. Boyish fun is always good. It interests everyone and there is nothing in it which leaves an unpleasant sting.

"The Lion Tamer."—Selig has produced a melodrama in this picture which possesses many points of interest. The love story, with its accompaniment of disappointment and jealousy, which begins to develop in the opening scene, is not essentially different from others of the same type. These are all practically alike in their main features, though the details may be differently worked out. Then comes the scenes of the old-fashioned circus, such as formerly traveled about the country for single day stands, and the picture reproduces the familiar scenes with striking fidelity to the originals. It is all interesting and holds the close attention of the audience. The last scenes, with their startling and unexpected ending, are melodramatic enough to satisfy the most exacting lover of stage thrillers. The action is so good that one almost hears the characters speak as they perform their parts, and the close of the picture brings a release from tension which has held the audience from the opening to the last. The Selig company has clearly produced another success in this film.

"The Message."—Beautiful scenery, faithfully rendered by good photography, furnish an ideal setting for this Biograph picture which tells the story of a woman who almost fell and was only saved by the interposition of her little child, who followed her and handed her a note. The dramatic power of the scene where the little one is following and where she hands the note to her mother, the note, by the way, from the erstwhile lover, who has suddenly appeared and succeeded in making her dissatisfied with her surroundings, is unusually appealing, and the person who can see it without betraying emotion is lacking in appreciation of good acting and strong suggestion. The story is the old one, but in the hands of the Biograph Company, and with their excellent photography, it develops added attractiveness, and few dry eyes are seen when the woman, listening to the child instead of the lover who would lead her astray, returns to her home thoroughly satisfied that her present environment is more satisfactory and yields her more genuine happiness than anything she might obtain in the city at the expense of her honor and the happiness of others.

SETTING THE SCENES FOR MOVING PICTURES.

The San Francisco "Chronicle" says that frequenters of "nickelodeons" and the various other places of amusement where moving pictures are displayed have been puzzled at times to understand how these pictures are obtained. The settings of many of the scenes are so unusual, the costumes so grotesque and the actions of the people in them so erratic, that they do, indeed, offer good cause for wonderment, when one stops to consider that the people in the pictures are real people, and the scenes actual ones.

For instance, there was a set of moving pictures displayed in one of San Francisco's places of amusement a few weeks ago wherein the chief personage was an old scientist with whiskers on his face of a cut to indicate that he was no longer young and active. This wonderful old scientist had invented a powerful magnet, which would attract anything, including people. It worked with a reel, not unlike a fishing reel, and was shaped like a huge horseshoe magnet. Not only would it attract people, but it would also repel them. Winding the reel forward attracted objects to it; winding it the other way repelled them. This old codger had all sorts of fun with his magnet. Standing beside a telegraph pole, he would level the thing at some person a block away, and draw that person to him instantly, and then, reversing his current by winding the reel in the opposite direction, would set them back to the place where they were, in a whisk. From his window on the third story he would point his magnet at some person on the sidewalk below, and draw that person right up to his apartment. At one time he had some half-dozen persons in the room, and every object of furniture in it, all hopping around at once, with lightning-like rapidity, and finally all tumbling together in a conglomerate mass on the floor.

This was very humorous; and when one comes to think of it, very wonderful. The pictures were of real people, not of dummies. And being real people, why were they not smashed into a thousand pieces? And how were they able to sail through the air, and move like lightning flashes hither and yon?

Everything Is Simple.

Everything is simple enongh when you know how it's done—as the fellow said.

Possibly you have noticed, if you are a frequent visitor to the places where moving pictures are used, that in nearly all instances the scenes presented, the people, and the settings, if the picture be of an interior, have a foreign look? Well, that is because a very large proportion of the moving pictures shown in this country are manufactured in France. Frenchmen seem to have been the first to realize what an immense demand there was going to be for moving pictures, especially those of a comic nature, and thus far they have what may be termed "the bulge" on the business of supplying them. Such little incongruities as a scene in a French police station, or a French hotel office, with signs on the walls in English, are easily overlooked. In fact, the American audience doesn't pay any attention to such things, so long as the general effect is good.

New Jersey is, however, becoming a rival of France in the production of moving pictures, and all the thrillers you see now; all the wild West scenes, showing train robberies and stage hold-ups; exciting pursuits of escaped convicts, and such, are New Jersey productions. But, strange as it may seem, we still have to bring over Frenchmen to show us how to get up the settings and stage the productions.

As will readily be believed, a great deal of ingenuity is needed in the making of settings, and the management of the scenes, and almost if not quite as much rehearsal is necessary as in the production of a new play. What you see upon the canvas is, of course, enacted first before the picture-making apparatus, and rehearsed several times, perhaps, before the final enactment.

I talked the other day with a man who has been in the business for years, and who made a trip to Paris to learn just how the Frenchmen do it. He had arrived at the conclusion that the Frenchmen had something up their sleeves in this moving picture business which Americans had not caught on to yet, and he discovered, after several weeks in Paris, that his conclusions were founded on fact.

Devise Plots and Scenes.

There are men in France who do nothing but devise plots and scenes for moving pictures. They plan out the entire play, as one might call it; possibly while seated at a small table at one of the open-air restaurants along the Champs Elysees or the Rue de Something-or-other like that, and their imaginations may be aided by occasional sips of absinthe and copious libations of black coffee. Anyhow, they must have some method of turning their minds into unusual channels, where they devolve these absurd and fanciful scenes.

Having perfected his plot, the Frenchman hurries to some "cinemahall" and finds the manager. To him the plot is unfolded, and the proposed scenes described. The plot is accepted, if it meets the approval of the manager, and rejected if not. If accepted the "author" is told to show up at a certain time for the first rehearsal. The first rehearsal is merely for the purpose of assigning the parts and selecting the costumes. Every "cinemahall" has a large company of actors and hangers-on to select from, and a wonderful property room and corps of property men and women. The people who take part in moving picture plays are for the most part broken-down actors and actresses, or stagefolk out of a job and down on their luck.

After the parts are assigned and the costumes chosen, a time is set for the first dress rehearsal, and each person in the cast is instructed in regard to his or her part, and ordered to show up at a certain minute, prepared to go on. Generally the time is 7 o'clock in the morning, for the moving picture makers are busy people, and they do not lose any time if they can help it. To show up at 7 o'clock means that they must have previously appeared at their dressing rooms and donned the costumes designated for each one. The make-up is an essential part of the play, notwithstanding that it is to be enacted on the streets of Paris, with only those people who happen along for an audience, instead of on a stage, with hundreds of eyes turned upon it from the seats in the auditorium. So the actor must not only put on his costume, but must make up for the part as well. The expression on his face is of no less importance than his costume.

The stage manager appears just as the artists are assembled, and proceeds to give them a reading of the scenario. The stage manager is very minute and particular as to little details, and perhaps he pauses in his reading frequently to illustrate a desired expression or gesture or some bit of action or "busines" that needs careful attention. The reading completed, an omnibus or two arrives at the entrance and the company is hauled away to the scene of the play.

Actors Play the Parts.

Some of my readers may remember to have seen a series of moving pictures illustrating the adventures of a man whose wife caught him in the act of kissing the maid. He receives from her a terrible cuff, and rushes from the apartment with a tremendously swollen jaw, to wander about the streets and fight with those who chance to laugh at him. Well, the man with whom I talked happened to be present when this particular film was produced. He describes the proceedings like this:

Actors to play the parts of luckless citizens who have the misfortune to encounter the afflicted husband are properly costumed and stationed in various parts of the city. The miserable husband, in costume, is driven, with some others, to a place near to where the first scene is to be enacted They alight, and the husband goes a short distance along the street and turns to retrace his steps and encounter the first person to laugh at his misfortune. He pauses at a fountain to bathe his burning cheek. One of the actors, costumed as a newsboy, approaches him and falls into a fit of uncontrollable laughter. Next instant he is sprawling in the gutter, from a well-aimed blow from the fist of the misused husband.

From here the husband dashes to the entrance of a near-by drug store for a lotion to soothe his bruised face. The consent of the drug store proprietor has been secured, of course; he has been guaranteed reimbursement for any loss, and the biograph machine is all set up in the place and made ready for operation. The drug clerk is, of course, a substitute, and one of the actors. He laughs at the unfortunate husband. When it is over, the drug store is in ruins.

An exchange of cards is made between each victim of the irate husband and that person, of course, and pretty soon he has a fine, large collection of impending duels on his hand. He sets the same time and place for all of them, and when he finally shows up there, under the trees in the park at Raincy, he meets a motley crowd, all bent upon his prompt annihilation, and none of them willing to wait until the other has had his chance. He, as the challenged party, has choice of weapons; he chooses his fists, and sails into the crowd, knocking them down in turn, and finally walking off, leaving them in a heap, waving their arms and legs in wild confusion.

Now the result of all this play is about 600 yards of film, or transparent ribbon, and on each and every yard of that ribbon there are fifty photographs. When that moving picture play is presented more than 10,000 photographs are reeled before the powerful electric light during the period of a very few minutes.

Enacted on the Streets.

This man tells me that hardly a day passes in Paris now but one or more of these absurd plays are enacted on the streets, and the people have come to know what they are. There are always plenty to congregate and to pose for a crowd, if a crowd is needed in the scene, and there are some who will persist in getting into the picture when they are not needed and not wanted. The police have to be called to clear away the people sometimes.

There was a series of moving pictures illustrating the Merry Widow hat craze of the early Summer. A dashing young lady (actress made up for the part, of course) leaped out of an automobile in front of a millinery shop. She wore a dinky little hat, some seasons out of style. When she emerged from the shop she was crowned by a moderate Merry Widow. The auto dashed along and the occupant of the tonneau caught sight of another millinery shop window, and stopped the machine. When she came out of this shop she wore a much larger Merry Widow. This is repeated until it is impossible for her to crowd through the doorway of the last place, and the entire front of the place has to be removed to permit of her egress, and when she sits in the auto again she hides machine, chauffeur and everything else with her Merry Widow. But she is now supremely happy; she has the largest one in town. It was entitled "Le Chapeau de Madame."

One day, at Les Ternes, there came very near being trouble. A highwayman, masked, and with a scarf about his throat, and a dagger protruding from his pocket, appeared and began chatting with two policemen, even accepting an offer of a cigarette from one of them. The first passer-by paused, and so did the second, and finally there was a crowd. Suddenly the highwayman pulled his dagger and attempted to stab a person who had approached hurriedly. The policemen interfered and there was a mixup. The crowd took a hand, and things were looking serious for the highwayman. Then a dapper little Frenchman had to appear and try to take the part of the highwayman, and before he could explain the whole outfit was hustled off to the station, where it all came out. The highwayman, the two policemen who were first on the scene, the man who was going to be stabbed, and two of the men in the crowd, the first two who stopped, were all actors for a "Cinemahall" and the little Frenchman was the stage manager. The films were secured, but there were several actors shown in the pictures who were not intended to be there.

There have been numerous accidents attending the securing of films for moving pictures, and some deaths have been caused. Not long ago an attempt was made in England, where a great many moving pictures are now being produced, to procure a scene wherein an actor was strapped to the rails while a moving train bore down upon him. Of course it was intended that the train should be brought to a stop just in time for the heroine to appear and rescue the victim. But, for some reason, the engineer of the train lost control of his brakes and the actor was killed.

You who have frequently seen moving pictures have doubtless noticed that the figures appearing in the scenes that are thrown upon the screen sometimes move with astonishing rapidity. It may seem strange, but it is a fact that the operator of the picture-taking machine, or biograph, produces the effect of more rapidly moving objects at will by simply working his apparatus more slowly. For instance we'll say he is going to take a picture of a man running a hundred yards in ten seconds. He could take one thousand photographs—separate and distinct photographs—of that runner during those ten seconds, if he wanted to, and when these photographs were thrown upon the screen the effect would be to reproduce the actual motions of the runner. But if he cuts the number of photographs taken during the same ten seconds down to five hundred, the effect would be to make the runner seem to actually bound or sail through the air. Portions of his successive postures will have been omitted, you see. The operator must be an expert. He must know about what speed to give his apparatus, so as to gauge the number of photographs taken.

Of recent years the apparatus is turned by electricity in many of the biograph establishments, and the rate of progression of the continuous film in front of the exposure is uniform, instead of varying as it must where the machine is operated by a crank in the hands of the operator. Doubtless you have noticed moving pictures where at certain times the people in the scenes appeared to move with remarkable rapidity, while at other times they appeared to act normally. These films were taken with a machine operated by hand, or else the films have been tampered with.

In the moving pictures where the scenes are within doors you have doubtless noticed too that the people have horrible peculiar whiteness. That pallor which is over all is the result of the artificial light in which the scenes are enacted while the pictures are being taken.

In one of the Paris theaters used by the biograph men there is a skylight over the stage of nearly 2,000 square yards in extent, and the light which comes through this is augmented by that from a dozen or more powerful arc lights. The direct rays of these lights are so powerful that if an actor stands close to them for any length of time they will raise blisters on hands or face.

Tricks of the Trade.

Of course, "it is a cinch," as we say in America, that all the many wonderful illusions produced by the moving picture machines are the result of some tricks of the trade, but some of these tricks are so simple, when you know them, that they are calculated to almost disgust a person who has been devoting any length of time and any amount of thought in trying to figure them out. Most of them are on a par with the set of pictures of the man who walks up the wall and runs along the ceiling, like a fly. This effect is so simply produced that if you have ever seen the pictures and wondered how the man could do such a wonderful thing as that, you will want to go out in the backyard and kick yourself when you learn all. A stage set representing a parlor wall is laid upon the stage floor. Further along is laid a set showing a dining-room ceiling. The apparatus and the operator are located up in the topmost of the gallery, looking down, and the man simply crawled on all fours from one set to the other across the stage.

Take a picture showing the interior of a carpenter shop, with the tools all at work, and nobody working them. It seems wonderful. It's done like this: The scene is set, and the tools all put in place for the first movement. Then the stage carpenter, who has put the tools in place steps out of the way and the first photograph is taken. He appears and moves them all slightly and the second photograph is taken when he has again disappeared. And so on until the film is completed. Nothing wonderful about it at all. Very slow and tedious, however.

Very wonderful are the moving pictures wherein a fairy appears from nowhere in particular and stands right before your eyes, and has every evidence of being a human being, too. And so simple, when you know how!

You simply pose the actress, begin taking pictures with a closed diaphragm, and open it gradually. To make the actress disappear into thin air you simply keep closing the diaphragm a little at a time until it is entirely closed!

Reversing the Operation.

Now, if you should want to make a statue out of a rough block of marble without any human agency, you just go at it backward, that's all. You have your statue all complete, and it appears to be chiseled out of marble, but in reality it is made out of white clay. It is reduced to a block of marble, apparently by systematic beatings with a paddle, but you do not take any pictures while the beatings are being administered, but only between beatings. Take the first picture as it stands. A man comes on and hits it a whack on top of the head. He steps off the stage and you take another picture. And so on. Then you run the film through the biograph machine backward.

Of course, it is possible to retouch the negatives before they are used, and to eliminate anything that is not needed and must not appear in the pictures. And there are some things that may be added to the pictures, too.

Once it was found necessary to have a set of pictures of a nurse sailing across the ocean all alone in a baby carriage. A seaworthy float was made, on which the baby carriage was placed, and the nurse was strapped into the baby carriage. A seagoing tug went ahead and towed the float, which was made to float just beneath the surface of the water. Of course it didn't go very far on the ocean, but it went far enough for the man with the machine to get some pictures, and the towline and parts of the float which showed were deftly painted out of the negatives.

The man who told me about some of these things was formerly employed by a firm in New York which produced moving pictures. Once, he told me, they sent him to some interior city where a county fair was in progress to take a set of films. He had his picture-taking apparatus mounted on an improvised platform on the dashboard of one of those little Oldsmobile runabouts that we used to see some years ago. He was getting a picture of the crowds of country people walking along the main street of the town and, while his assistant ran the Oldsmobile slowly along the street, he stood up in front and turned the crank of the picture-taking machine. Two natives saw them moving slowly by.

pasty complexions, and that everything seems to have a

"By jing! that must be one of them autymubbles, hain't it, Ike?" said one of them.

"I reckon 'tis; but gol durn me ef I knowed they'd got 'em so's they kin run 'em with a crank!"

The time is surely coming when we shall have moving pictures without the disagreeable shimmer that accompanies them now, and, when all the natural colors of the original scenes will be presented true to life. Wonderful as have been the improvements thus far made, those that are promised will be more wonderful still. Even now we are beginning to get the colors. The coloring of the pictures is now done by a very delicate operation, and mostly performed by women who have had training as artists. They work with magnifying glasses and delicate brushes. And besides this artificial hand-painting of the negatives, those which represent night scenes are dipped in baths of blue; sunlight effects have a bath of light yellow; forest scenes a bath of green.

Thousands of miles of films are shipped from France to the United States every day, and many thousands of miles of them are manufactured in the United States every day. France leads the world in production now, but this condition is likely to be reversed soon, and the industry promises to be a great one in this country.

San Francisco firms handle a large number of rolls of films for moving pictures, this city being the headquarters of the business of supplying big and little theaters on the Coast.

MOVING PICTURES HELP WOMEN.

Give Work to Many a Struggling Actress.

A daily newspaper says: Woman's chances of making a living have been increased by the rise of the biograph machines. Many a young actress anxiously awaiting an engagement will agree to this. At the start, when one concern controlled the production of moving pictures in this country, women helpers were not seriously considered in the plans of managers. As a rule when a woman was needed a man donned petticoats and played the part. Even now in a certain class of pictures this is sometimes done. Every year there has been an increased demand for women to pose, and indications are that the demand will go on increasing, for instead of one concern in the field there are now fifteen at least.

"I need these in my business," explained a young woman who was surprised in her bedroom by a visit from a friend. She was working on what looked like a very full pair of bloomers made of coarse, inexpensive gray flannel, with blouse waist to match.

"When do you expect to need anything so ugly?" asked the other in surprise.

"Next Monday morning, when I shall jump into the water, strike out for a rowboat, clamber in and row off."

"Mercy!" gasped the listener. "What sort of a play are you booked for now? I thought you were not expecting an engagement for two months to come."

Then the other confessed. She was posing for moving pictures, and her ability to swim and manage a rowboat had got her the job. These talents had not so far been of any particular use to her in her stage career, but supplemented with her stage experience they made her eligible for a moving picture model at a time when a few five-dollar bills looked like a fortune to her. In doing her stunt, she explained, after she and the photographer and his assistants had journeyed to an isolated suburban spot, the young woman would wear the gray flannel suit—the full bloomers easily passing for a skirt, especially when water soaked. In scene number two of the same series she beaches her boat, supposedly half a mile away, although in reality she only goes a few yards down the shore, jumps out and runs away. In fact, at this juncture she does make a decline to a nearby house, where dry wearing apparel awaits her. The succeeding scenes of the same series may not be made until the next day and in quite a different part of the country, the length of time required depending a good deal on the cleverness of the posers. This is another way of saying that the average amateur, no matter how accomplished she thinks she is in aquatic exercises or how much at home she may be in a boat, is not likely to be favorably regarded by managers for the role of a moving picture model.

"We haven't time to coach the inexperienced," explained the head of one moving picture concern. "Moving pictures are pantomime, and to give good pantomime requires clever actors."

As a matter of fact so tremendously varied is the present output of moving pictures that every possible variety of talent can be and is used in their manufacture. Women who have never had a chance to do more behind the footlights than move about gracefully, and actresses who earn $100 a week when lucky enough to get an engagement are alike registered at the offices of the several concerns which make and keep the pictures moving, as well as women who have learned the business of the stage without getting a chance to put it all in practice.

All these, and in the aggregate there are several hundreds of them, jot down by advice of managers in the line under their name any specialty they imagine they have, whether it is falling down stairs, fainting, giving a knockout blow, weeping real tears, running, swimming, playing ball, firing a gun, climbing ladders or jumping out of a window.

There is an adage that no woman can be taught how to run or to throw anything straight, therefore the woman who registers as a good runner or ball player usually finds herself as much in demand as the woman who records that her specialty is Shakespearian roles. What is more to the point, her pay will be equally good. Five dollars a day is the usual remuneration received by a moving picture model, and often it takes many days to complete a series of pictures, particularly if the scenes are made out of doors and photographers and models must travel to some distant spot.

Women engaged by a biograph manufacturer need give no attention to wardrobe or properties of any sort. Every company sets up a property room which includes a collection of wearing apparel, draperies, sporting goods, musical instruments and other things which would make any second-hand dealer the world over turn green with envy.

Therefore, when the eloping young woman is spilled into the stream she wears clothes from the property room. When the athletic, sure-footed young woman in the role of thief at a house party climbs at night out of one window, crawls along a narrow coping high above the ground and into another window she is done up in pajamas which belong to the property room. Trolley and railroad fares, carriage and automobile hire are all paid by the manager. Thus the $5 bill handed to each actress—the word model is not popular with biograph employees—at the end of a few hours' work is subject to no deductions for expenses and none is asked to wait for her pay until the end of the week or until the series of pictures is finished.

To students from the various schools of acting the moving picture business is a boon, in one case an impecunious young woman confessing that but for the employment she got from time to time with one concern she would have been obliged to give up finishing her course of study.

"Do you really succeed in getting actresses who have played leads in Shakespearian roles to pose for moving pictures?" a manager was asked.

"Certainly we do. They are not to be had every day, of course, but at the off seasons when there is nothing doing in their line and no revenue is in sight women who when playing an engagement draw their little $100 or $150 a week are perfectly willing to register with us. And at any time when we are short of a certain style of woman to pose for dramatic pictures of a high class all we have to do is to advertise the fact and we have more applicants than can be taken care of.

"We have no graded scale of pay, and the woman with a beautiful face gets no more than the plainer woman. Action, not looks, is what recommends a woman for employment with us, and the more experienced the applicant the better chance she has. Ingenues are not popular with biograph managers, and novices with no stage experience have no show at all."

LICENSED MANUFACTURERS MEET.

A meeting of the licensed manufacturers was held in the rooms of the Patents Company last Thursday. All were present with the exception of Mr. H. N. Marvin, who was out of town, and Mr. S. Long, who was in Europe. The business was merely routine and of no special importance.

The license of the Duquesne branch exchange at Norfolk, Va., was cancelled, also that of the Talking Machine Company, Rochester, N. Y. The American Film Exchange, of Chicago, was given permission to purchase the licensed film in possession of the Star Film Exchange. This enabled the American to resume business immediately after the total loss of their stock in a fire which occurred in the Security building last week.

Permission was given to film exchanges operating in the South to rent films in Northern Mexico.

It was reported that the exchanges in the principal centers were now operating in harmony, and this co-operative spirit is expected to be more strongly cemented at the meeting in Atlantic City next week.

The manufacturers all expressed themselves as being highly satisfied with the conditions as compared with previous years.

THE AMERICAN FILM EXCHANGE.

On the night of June 30, a disastrous fire in the Security building, Chicago, completely destroyed the stock of the American Film Exchange. With characteristic energy the manager, Mr. Van Ronkle, immediately secured new quarters and arranged for the purchase of the licensed film in possession of the Star Film Exchange (now independent).

It is worthy of note that this fire demonstrated the safety of the N. I. film. While the films printed on this stock were rendered useless by the water and the terrific heat, they were not consumed.

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE CHICAGO FILM EXCHANGE RELATIVE TO PRESENT FILM SITUATION.

Messrs. Phil and Max Lewis, general manager and president of the Chicago Flm Exchange, are very optimistic about film matters, and gave us the statement for publication that "The Independent movement is the salvation of the film industry."

We asked if they regretted their move for independence. They answered with a degree of just pride that thus far they had no reason to regret giving birth to the Independent movement. They believe they have emancipated the American exhibitors from a tyranny that was bound to stint the growth of the film industry.

We asked: "What will be the outcome of the fight between Association and Independent?" They answered: "The result is obvious. The revolt from the Trust was necessary for the proper evolution of the film business. The licensed manufacturers are a limited number, while the number of manufacturers and the possibilities of the Independents are unlimited. The public with their inherent spirit of liberty, stands with the Independents. With the public against you it means sure death. With the public for you it means a life of success."

"To what do you attribute your growth and success?" we asked. "We realize permanent success comes from always satisfying the patrons. A firm must make money for and please a customer in order to retain him. When we consider the exhibitor's welfare first, our welfare takes care of itself. This is the secret of our success."

Mr. Phil Lewis has just returned from a tour inspecting the branch offices. He informed us each of the seven offices are in properous condition, with the demand for Independent films great everywhere.

"Will the new American manufactured films satisfy the people?" "We believe we've been in the film business long enough to know when we have a good thing. The Carson, Phoenix and Tiger American manufacturers, with whom we are now affiliated, are releasing absolute headliners that cannot be excelled anywhere in the world. Pretty strong assertion, but we're safe in making it."

We were next treated to an exhibition of the new film steadier. This exchange is most fortunate in securing this, for it surely prevents that common complaint that motion pictures hurt the eyes. This is the greatest accomplishment in the machine line for years and will no doubt greatly increase the picture business throughout the world.

We were pleased to meet and interview Mr. Geiger, manager of the fight-picture department. This gentleman wears the kind of a smile successful business alone can bring. His present feature, the "Summers-Britt Fight" that occurred in London, England, February 22 of this year, has been a big money-getter, and we congratulate the exchange on getting the exclusive rights of these pictures.

NEW INDEPENDENT EXCHANGE.

W. A. Dean, 1026 West Eighth street, Los Angeles, Cal., formerly joint owner of the Regal Theater, has sold out his interest and started an Independent film exchange, also handling supplies and song slides. He wants to hear from manufacturers of Independent films whose products are approved by the National Board of Censorship.

The Chicago Song Slide Exchange is reporting a steady increasing business. The illustrated song has become indispensable with the well conducted theater, and a good singer and beautiful slides are to some the chief attraction on the programme. Exhibitors all through the country are beginning to realize the importance of this and are booking their songs, just like their film service, through firms that make a specialty of this line. Film exchanges used to carry slides as a side line, but it seems like the film people didn't give the attention to this entertainment that it deserved. This fact was early recognized by Messrs. Honeck, the originators of the song slide exchange in the West, and these gentlemen opened an establishment for renting of song slides for a small rental fee a week. The idea met with a tremendous success from the very start and hundreds of theaters all through the country are now getting their weekly supply of song slides from this firm. The success of the Chicago Song Slide Exchange, of course, is largely due to the grit and ample management of the two brothers who run the Chicago office, Messrs. C. E. and C. R. Honeck. Mr. R. C. Honeck, president of the concern, has been compelled to abandon their St. Louis office to be able to handle the increase of trade in the last few weeks accumulated in the Chicago office.

THE WILD WEST IN THE EAST.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Sir—After having read a good many of your editorials and criticisms on different moving picture subjects that have been shown on the canvas lately, I can not resist the temptation to express a few of my own views on the matter. I agree with you on a good many of your criticisms, but on a few others I do not. In one of them, which you entitle "Fooling the Public," you begin with, "If the ——— Company would so and so, etc." It seems to me that you, as well as the other worthy editor, seem to think that it is a great task to find scenery to compare with Western scenery in this part of the land. You also think that it is almost an impossibility to produce pictures of Wild West nature, owing to that disadvantage. Well, yes, it is a very difficult matter to do so, and especially when that kind of picture is handled by incompetent producers. Take every picture of that kind that was produced by the company named, look at them, study them, and see if the same kind of scenery does not appear in every picture. Then study the others and you will see just the same scenery. Who is to blame? Is it not the producer's fault? Or is it that the authorities will not allow the company named to take pictures on private or public ground? That company has had to purchase a certain plot of land for the taking of pictures. If so, why he is to be excused, and if not so, the ——— Company ought to be looking around for another producer. There is no use trying to get around the matter, there is some screw loose in ——— ——— and the quicker he discovers it the better it will be for all concerned. Get a change of scenery, make a change in another department and let us see some new faces in the pictures once in a while. If there is any sympathy at heart for the poor old veterans pension them off and let them retire. For the company named is one of the oldest in this part of the country, and with the financial backing that it has it ought to produce the same quality of pictures that the Biograph people are making famous. He handles good subjects, in fact, very good ones, but, oh my! Well, that's all on that little matter. On the other hand, if the kind editor disputes my veracity on the Western scenery why don't he, like the ——— Company, just go over in Jersey and take a few hours' ride in an auto or on the cars and he will see some very good Western scenery. Of course it won't stretch for miles and miles, but there will be enough to get as much scenery for a Western picture as will be desired by any competent producer. I am, Yours, etc.,

WILD WEST.

New York, June 29, 1909.

[Our correspondent writes with knowledge and authority. Physiographically New Jersey in parts probably compares with Nebraska and other States, and if every producer were intelligent enough to fit his scenery to his subject there would be no call for our own and other criticisms. Where "local color" is introduced into a moving picture let it at least look accurate. Apparent, if not real accuracy, is all that we ask for.—Editor M. P. W.]

THE CARDINAL'S CONSPIRACY.—Proving that when a woman will, she will.

"He's a fool, who thinks by force or skill,
To turn the current of a woman's will."

Self-will is undeniably the dominant note in the nature of most women. With fixed determination they are as stubbornly redoubtable as the tide. Oppose her, and you may be sure she will defy you; plan and arrange for her, and she is sure to resist; in fact, she is contrariety personified. Such was the nature of Princess Angela, whose father, the King, had been so indiscreet as to select for her a husband in the person of a Prince of the neighboring domain, which alliance the King ardently wished, as it meant relief in his present impecunlosity. Well, it was the old story, the arrangement was, of course, repugnant, inasmuch as she desires to make her own choice, hence she will not even deign to look at the Prince, and no amount of persuasion or threats will induce her to change her mien. The condition is most discouraging to the King, whose affairs would have been immeasureably improved by the match. The Cardinal, however, understanding the whims and foibles of womankind, hits upon a scheme to bring about a successful issue in spite of the Princess' stubbornness. He induces the Prince, with the aid of his barber, to change his facial appearance, although it was hardly necessary, as the Princess had not even glanced at his face. He is then disguised as a guard, and enlists the services of three cut-throats that he may play the hero in this wise: while the Princess is strolling in the gardens, the thugs seize her with the ostensible intention of carrying her off, but the disguised Prince rushes to her rescue, and pretends to slay them all, thereby making himself a gallant hero in her eyes. She is at once smitten with the brave guard, and allows him to escort her to the palace, where he is at once seized and thrown into prison for presuming to accompany her Royal Highness. And so it goes—the more they forbid her associating with her hero lover, the more she is determined, until at length she dons the garb of a maid to elope with her simple swain. This move is thwarted by the Cardinal, who is carefully watching the working out of his plot. The recalcitrant Princess with her lover is brought before the King, where she defiantly avows she will marry her hero, when the identity of the guard is announced. He is a Prince, yet she had her way. The subject is, as you perceive, along high class comedy lines, beautifully acted, with setting seldom, if ever, equalled. Length, 995 feet.

THE FRIEND OF THE FAMILY.—The most colossal egotist is he who boasts of his impregnability of the fascination of a pretty woman, for the most austere wiseacre will become a doting fool under her puissant influence, so we do not marvel at the action of Robert Edmonds in falling a victim to the ensnaring charms of Estelle Morse during a house party at his residence. From that evening on he becomes her abject slave to the neglect of his own devoted wife and child. Mrs. Edmonds tries hard to dissemble and keep her sorrow from the little one, but he too misses the society of papa, his little romps with him and his good-night kiss on going to bed, until at last he is constrained to write papa a note complaining of his neglect. The baby's innocent missive almost breaks mamma's heart, for she feels that her husband is being weaned away by some unknown power. Robert is simply oblivious to all sense of duty through this blinding fascination and would have cast aside wife, child and all things sacred for this woman, had not Jack Hudson, his dearest friend, stepped in and resolved to save him at all hazards. Jack learns of Robert's intention to elope with the other woman, and calls on her just after Robert has gone to get his suitcase preparatory to depart. Jack steps boldly into the affair and during Robert's absence becomes so ardently caressing in speech and action that she, the most fickle of her sex, forgets Robert and is now Jack's apparent affianced. At this moment Robert returns ready for flight; but at once realizes the change. Crestfallen he returns home where he finds baby's letter on the table. The child's tearful, mute appeal awakens him from his lethargy and we leave him with the little fellow clasped to his breast, while the mother, unseen by him, views the spectacle from the staircase. This Biograph subject is an extremely beautiful work of dramatic and photographic art. Length, 749 feet.

TENDER HEARTS.—A pretty little pastoral, beautifully set and admirably acted. It shows how one slight, thoughtless action may discover the true nature of a man, and dash to atoms his fondest hopes. Nellie's hand is sought by a twain of swains. One is a simple farmer lad, while the other is a handsome, dressy chap, who has lived in the city. As appearances are everything, the city chap is the favored one, until one day a hunter shoots a dove which he leaves wounded in the road. Nellie witnesses this occurrence with grieved heart, but the worst comes when her dandy suitor passes, sees the bird and kicks it aside. A moment later the farmer boy approaches and picking up the dove carries it caressingly away in his straw hat. This decides her. The simple lad wins the day. Length, 233 feet.

THE SECRET OF THE LOCKET.—Rich with interest and a veritable mine of dramatic qualities is the story embodied in this film play, a play that has been handled with exact skill and presented in a manner worthy the strength of its subject. The acting is of the best quality, scenically it leaves nothing to be desired even by the most captious, and photographically it is one of the best films ever placed on the market.

A woman, the wife of a rich man, Thomas Underwood, is driven to despair by the nagging of her husband's relatives at home and, finding no relief at her husband's hands, finally leaves with her little girl, Mary. The struggle with the world is harder than she realized; the last dire poverty and hunger are the portion of mother and child. Mrs. Underwood receives an offer for work. Alas, it will be sixteen days before the position is open. Her child may starve meanwhile. She has an idea. She pawns the little one, intending to redeem her in thirty days, in the interim she can live on the money thus secured.

She falls from starvation at the door of a restaurant, and dies, without recovering consciousness, in a hospital. There is no clue to the identity of the mother, save a picture in a locket which the Jewish pawnbroker has secured.

The Jew keeps and cares for the child. Sixteen years later the child's father's home is burglarized and the thief attempts to pawn with the old Jew a locket he had secured there. In the locket is a picture of the same woman who pawned the little girl with him years before. Through this the child is returned to its parent, the Jew nobly refusing to accept even a cent from the father in remuneration of his years of care for the girl. He had supported the child through sheer love for her.

The story is fascinating; it is full of powerful scenes and situations and has been adequately told in the pictorial pantomime. Length, 915 feet.

CAUGHT BY THE COUPON CRAZE.—For months Bilkins had been confronted by the numerous coupon signs in the cigar store where he traded, yet paid no attention to them. The gifts, alluringly exhibited, to go with so many coupons, failed to attract his notice. The offers of coupons made by the obliging clerks whenever he made a purchase, he scorned. He would have no coupons, didn't want to be bothered with them.

One fatal day, however, Bilkins had his wife with him when he bought some cigars. She saw a beautiful lamp among the gifts for coupons, and that was the beginning of Bilkins' undoing. She urged him to get coupons and save them. She wanted that lamp and wanted it without delay. Bilkins began to get coupons at once, presently he had the craze in all its virulency. He bought cigars for the sake of coupons. He stacked his house with them. He bought for his friends. He would use money for no other purpose. Theaters were eliminated from the family's horizon. Bilkins must buy cigars to secure more coupons.

When Bilkins lost coupons or they were blown away by the wind he forgot everything else but to recover the little green billets, even though the chase led him, splash, into a pool of water. If he lost the cigars while he was chasing, what mattered it? He had the coupons.

He smoked himself blue in the face, he could no longer look at a tobacco sign, but still he bought. At last the glad day arrived. He had the necessary 500 coupons and the $7.98 lamp was escorted home in triumph. It was given a place of honor on the parlor table. The family raved over it. Their excitement ran high. Then it happened. Bilkins was waving his arms in enthusiastic description, the lamp was in the way; over it went, and then the firemen came. When they departed Bilkins stood in the midst of a wrecked home—stood and mourned. Sadly he gazed, and as he gazed the friend for whom he had bought so many cigars arrived to sympathize. He offered Bilkins a cigar—Bilkins, who had just been brought to such ruin through cigars. Can you imagine how Bilkins felt? Let us draw the curtain. It was too much for Bilkins. Length, 435 feet.

THE EGYPTIAN MYSTERY.—Here is a sure comedy hit and one that will keep any audience convulsed with laughter with every flash from the reel. It fairly bubbles merriment and radiates the keenest enjoyment and, what is an essential point, is clean and sweet in its motif.

A lady is given a pendant that has been found in an ancient Egyptian tomb. It is said that anything its wearer's hands rest upon will disappear. The lady soon finds, to her horror, that this is true and she hastily orders her cook to throw it away. The cook presents it to her friend the iceman, however, and when the iceman embraces her in an ecstacy of gratitude the cook vanishes in his arms. Astounded, for he knows nothing whatever about the mysterious quality of the pendant he is wearing, the iceman starts back, and other objects disappear upon which he chances to place his hands. Finally the wall of the house vanishes and the iceman runs to his wagon, which crumbles to nothing under his touch.

This is too much for the brain of the iceman, and as soon as he can, for the moment, recover himself he hurries away, only to find the mysterious horror still with him wherever he goes. A baby carriage disappears under his touch, and the amazed nurse finds her charge sprawling on the sidewalk; a street car he attempts to board turns to thin air and car and passengers fall to the street; a park bench dematerializes and a pair of lovers sitting on it go with a crash to the ground.

He can't understand it all himself and it is little wonder, therefore, with such a chain of strange events weighing on his mind, that when he finally sees his visage in a mirror he is shocked beyond measure. He reels toward it, puts his trembling hand forward, touches the reflection of himself and, bing!—there is a puff of smoke, and the iceman and mirrored self have vanished. With his own touch he sent himself the way of all other things he had placed hand upon that fatal morning, and the Egyptian pendant went with him. Length, 565 feet.

WHICH IS WHICH?—"Which Is Which?" is a comedy, original in theme, and protrays the adventures of a bogus Lord and an American sweetheart.

Colonel Price's daughter is engaged to a young American, when she meets a man impersonating Lord Dunbury. She immediately thinks she wants a title, breaks her engagement with her American sweetheart and accepts the attention of the bogus Lord.

The American sweetheart makes up his mind to break the engagement. Impersonating the Lord, he goes to the girl's house and disgusts her by his actions. He is thrown out, but does not know that word has been received at the police station to arrest the bogus Lord, and the policemen arrive on the spot just in time to see him come out of the home. They of course think he is the Lord, and immediately take him to the police station. Explanation follows; he leads the policemen to where the real bogus Lord is; then goes to his sweetheart's home as a plain American, and reconciliation follows. Length, 450 feet.

THE NEW COP.—An undersized man, gifted with much ignorance, but who has a pull with a local politician, secures a position as a policeman. He is given a book of rules and told to enforce the law on his beat, and his efforts in trying to arrest innocent people are extremely ludicrous. A man is trying to get into his own home and the "New Cop" thinking he is a burglar pounces upon him. A man carrying a bundle of laundry is intercepted. A painter going up a ladder is pulled down. The "New Cop" goes on doing these ridiculous things until he meets a bull dog on the sidewalk. This proves his Waterloo. The policeman tells the lady the dog must be muzzled. She becomes very indignant at his intrusion and lets the dog loose. The Cop immediately beats it. The dog follows. The Cop, with the dog hanging on to him, runs into the police station asking aid from the sergeant. The sergeant takes the star from him and forcibly ejects them all from the place. Length, 550 feet.

ONLY A DREAM.—In this exceedingly mystifying series of views one magical incident follows another and the attention of your audience is retained throughout the entertainment.

The story is that of an eccentric pauper inflicting innumerable and aggravating difficulties upon Sir Huntel, a retired merchant, who refuses to contribute to the support of the former. As a final the merchant awakens from his slumber and becomes aware that all was only a dream. Length, 470 feet.

A SURE CURE.—At the conclusion of dinner the host experiences a violent attack of the hiccoughs. His compassionate wife advises a number of remedies, each proving unsuccessful. Other remedies, some of them strong enough to scare him out of a year's growth, are enforced upon him, the police interfere and other escapades, too numerous to mention, are indulged in, but all to no avail.

As a last resource his mother-in-law is brought in to him and the sight of that dignitary effects immediate relief. Length, 490 feet.

IN THE HANDS OF THE ENEMY.—A touching incident of the Franco-Prussian War. In a little village in France, in 1870, the arrival of a detachment of Prussians is announced. Consternation fills the hearts of the timid folk, but a gamekeeper secretes himself in ambush from where he kills one of the advance guards. Fearing an attack the other members of the guard retreat and soon the regular troops are on the ground. It develops that no general attack was contemplated, but a search for the person responsible for the soldier's death is unsuccessful. They take with them as hostage the son of the gamekeeper. When, upon his return, the father learns the news, he is sorely perplexed and he induces his neighbors to turn him over as the guilty man with the explanation that he is insane.

The truth of the claim is doubted and a test is made. He is placed before an execution platoon to be shot but endures the test without a flinch. The son is now placed in the father's position and at the crucial moment the strain upon the father is so great that he gives way, whereupon he is immediately executed. Length, 734 feet.

THE LOST TIE.—Ordinarily it is the collar button that gets lost, but in this instance a gentleman becomes so flustrated about a pretty servant that he leaves his tie dangling from its support at the back of his neck and later upsets the entire room in his efforts to locate it. His wife finally comes to his aid and serenity is restored. Length, 227 feet.

THE CARDINAL'S CONSPIRACY

Proving that When a Woman Will, She Will.

Self-will is undeniably the dominant note in the nature of most women, and when the King selects a husband for his daughter she, of course, rebels and won't even look at him. The Cardinal, however, knowing the woman's nature, plots to have the King's wish gratified in spite of the Princess' objections. Disguising the selected suitor as a guard, he succeeds in having the girl fall in love with him. She is, of course, surprised to find her simple lover a Prince, but then she had her way. The subject is elaborately staged, comprising some of the most beautiful exterior scenes ever shown.

LENGTH, 999 FEET.

RELEASED JULY 15, 1909.

THE FRIEND OF THE FAMILY

This is one incident where a friend had to be seemingly cruel to be kind. The husband is deeply fascinated by the charms of a beautiful woman whom he met at a house-party, and would have cast aside all things sacred for her; but the friend, seeing his danger, becomes a rival for her attention and wins her. The husband, realizing his folly, is thankful for his deliverance, while the friend simply laughs the woman to scorn.

LENGTH, 749 FEET.

TENDER HEARTS

A pretty little pastoral, beautifully staged and admirably acted. It shows how the tender treatment of a wounded dove decides a young girl in favor of her simple country suitor against the dressy city chap. The subject is indeed of the highest type of picture story with a simple heart appeal.

LENGTH, 233 FEET.

THE ESCAPE FROM ANDERSONVILLE.—A true story of the Civil War.

Andersonville, how familiar the name! How often in the years that followed the great Civil War have we gathered around some old battle-scarred veteran and listened while he painted for us, with homely eloquence, word pictures of the horrors of prison life there, and told us of some daring escape. Just such a thrilling story of the escape of six prisoners, as told by one of them, is told in this film. All six were natives of the same little Massachusetts village. Enlisting in different regiments they became widely separated only to meet again as fellow prisoners in the pen at Andersonville.

Scene I. Federal Prisoners in the Stockade.—The first scene opens with a view of a corner of the stockade that surrounded the land comprising the prison. Here, stretched out under the sweltering sun of a July day, are the little bands of Federal prisoners with whom our story deals. Dressed in rags, haggard and worn, many months of privation have weakened them so they are barely able to raise themselves from the ground. One poor fellow, unable longer to continue the struggle, sinks back lifeless. The guard, hardened to such scenes by continual repetition, touches the corpse with his foot and calls for the helpers to remove it. The remaining prisoners follow the body of their late comrade with sorrowful eyes and shudderingly wonder when their time will come for this last journey. The brutal guard taunts them cruelly. Now he brings in their meagre rations. Like starving dogs they wrangle for them and crouching on the ground eagerly devour them. Here come the guards with new prisoners. Another man from the little village. Eagerly they ask him for news from the front and what are their chances for being exchanged. He sorrowfully shakes his head. One of the guards orders him to sit down. He refuses. With a savage curse the guards fell him to the earth and while the remaining prisoners crouch trembling with fear, laugh tauntingly.

Scene II. The Tunnel.—Now darkness has thrown its pall over the prison. Six long weary weeks have passed. The little band, urged on by the newcomers, who are strong and eager, have with infinite caution and patience been digging their way to freedom. Under the few old rags that compose their beds the mouth of the tunnel is hidden from the guards. No sooner is the guard out of sight than work commences. Two of the prisoners enter the tunnel. Hark! the guard is coming! Out in the swamps all seems quiet under the eyes of the guard tramping his beat. But what is that? Look closely. A quiver seems to run through the tall swamp grass. Out from the roots comes a man's hand. Slowly up through the grass follows the head of a prisoner. A quick look around and down he crouches. Surely a wise Providence must have guided them in their work for the mouth of their tunnel is hidden from the guard by a pile of old logs. Down the prisoner goes to carry the joyful news to his comrades. Quickly the news reaches them. Two more prisoners disappear down the tunnel. But now the remaining two are in a desperate plight. How shall they prevent the guard, now approaching, giving alarm? Their plans are soon made. On comes the guard. He notices the fresh dirt and stops to examine it. Quick as a flash one of the prisoners feils him to the earth. Eagerly the other takes his gun and disappears down the hole. With eager, trembling hands the last prisoner seizes the lifeless body of the guard and drops it into the tunnel, stopping only to grab the guard's telltale bayonet, he disappears. The rags are cunningly drawn over the hole from below and nothing remains to attract the attention of any guard who may happen to pass near.

Scene III. Liberty at Last.—Up through the opening in the tall grass again appears the head of the first prisoner. He crawls out, looks around and beckons up his companion. Cautiously watching the sentry for fear of discovery they sneak off into the swamp. Another of the poor fellows makes his appearance and follows the two leaders. Up comes the haggard and worn face of another prisoner. He stops to help up the next man who is guarding jealously the precious gun secured from the guard. Both crawl cautiously away. And now the last man appears. Stealthily he crawls out. He lifts his hand to heaven with joy, then follows his companions, and nothing remains for the searching eyes of the guard but the waving green of the swamp grass.

Scene IV. The Flight Through the Swamp.

Scene V. A Northern Sympathizer.—Back at the end of a little lane from the main road is the humble home of Mrs. Carter. Of New England parentage, although married to a Southerner now with Lee in Virginia, her secret sympathy has ever been with the North. She goes slowly towards the house with a pail of water from the spring. Around the corner comes one of the fugitives. Desperate hunger has driven them to the open. Cautiously he approaches the door and knocks. Mrs. Carter comes to the door. One look tells her she has nothing to fear from this wan and pitiful man. The other prisoners are beckoned on. Mrs. Carter brings out a loaf of wheat bread. Eagerly they devour it, the first they have tasted for months. One of the men sees the gun hanging above the door of the cabin. He begs Mrs. Carter for it. Willingly she gives it to them and entering the house returns with a pistol and more precious still a bag of powder and bullets. The men are fervent in their thanks. One poor fellow kisses the hem of her dress in thankfulness. Now, at last, they will be able to make a stern fight for liberty. With repeated prayers of thankfulness they hurry away.

Scene VI. The Stolen Locomotive.—The fugitives have now reached the Georgia Central Railroad. Out on a siding stands an engine. The engineer and fireman have steam up and into the cab jumps one of the prisoners. The engineer and firement are ordered to throw up their hands. Up climb the others and still holding the railroad men at bay they are away with the engine. The engineers and fireman watch them out of sight, then rush back to the Confederate outpost to give the alarm.

Scene VII. The Pursuit.—The alarm is soon given and a squad of Confederate soldiers led by the two men dash up to a switch engine standing near and soon they are on the main track and after the fugitives. Now we see the prisoners dashing along firing back at the Confederates, who are following closely behind in stern pursuit. The prisoners urge the old engine forward, for they realizes the Confederates are gaining on them.

Scene VIII. The Confederate Engine Breaks Down.—Around a curve in the track come the Confederates on their engine. Gradually they have cut down the distance between the two engines until the fugitives are almost in their grasp. But something is the matter. The engine is losing speed. Now it stops. The engineer rushes forward. A cloud of steam envelopes him. Excitedly he explains to the Confederates that their engine is hopelessly broken down. In frantic rage the Confederates watch their prey slip through their hands.

Scene IX. Orders to Blow Up the Trestle Before the Fugitives.—Up the line we find a sleepy little country station. Two trainmen are lounging about watching the baggage man at his work. Out rushes the operator holding in his hand a telegram. Hurriedly it is shown the men. All is excitement to reach the Red Bridge ere the fugitives arrive there. Off to the powder house they rush. The door is burst open and a bag of giant powder secured. But no engine is at hand. How shall they reach the Red Bridge? The hand car! Off they rush! Soon the car is on the track and they are away. How desperately they work to force the car along, in their mad desire to intercept the fugitives!

Scene X. A Narrow Escape.—Here is the Red Bridge only a few miles from the Union lines. Up comes the hand car. Not a moment must be lost. Off the track the car is lifted, the powder is in place and a fuse laid. Now they are ready for the fugitives. Not a second too soon for around the curve of the trestle comes the engine bearing the fugitives. Only a few more miles and they will be safely within the Union lines. The engine reaches the mine. Crash! The explosion! Too late! Through the cloud of smoke we see the engine still moving forward and bearing the fugitives safely to the haven they have struggled so bravely to gain.

Scene XI. Ten Days Later—Home at Last.—Ten days have passed and the prisoners are nearing home. Back to the little village nestling amongst the Berkshire Hills the news has flown of their escape and great preparations have been made to receive the returning heroes. Two disabled soldiers, home on sick leave, stand with fife and drum ready to give them a martial greeting. All the women and children are gathered here and what few men grim war has left in the village. Down the track of the branch line connecting them with the outside world is seen the train approaching. What a reception it gets! Hats are thrown in the air, arms wave, the fife whistles shrilly and the drum roars out its welcome to the returning heroes. Soon they are in the midst of the loved ones, the thought of whom had been as a beacon leading them on to greater effort in those miserable days spent under the sweltering Southern sun.

DRIVEN FROM HOME.—The daughter of a rich merchant is in love with one of her father's clerks. The father learns of this infatuation when certain papers are presented to him for immediate payment, which he is unable to meet. These papers are forged and the man who presents them is Jim, the forger, unknown, however, to those present. Jim is willing to relinquish his claim, provided the young daughter is forced to marry him. She refuses to accede to her father's wishes and runs into the arms of the man she loves. The father tells her to choose between himself and her lover—she chooses the latter and is driven from home.

The young people live in a happy little home. They are soon discovered by Jim, who swears to destroy their happiness. He follows the young man to his place of employment and effects his discharge. Try as he may, the evil spirit follows him and drives him away from every position. When at last he finds Jim outside of his home, he steps out and knocks him down. Accidentally Jim's moustache comes off. A policeman who tries to separate the fighters recognizes in one a long-sought criminal. Jim is arrested, the forged papers thrown out of court, and the young couple are reinstated in the graces of the father. Length, 750 feet.

however, is jealous. When, a few days later, the uncle makes a will in favor of Ruth, leaving Celeste only an annuity, Celeste decides to take a hand in the matter. She visits Prof. De Monti, a hypnotist, and under promise of $50,000 induces him to hypnotize Ruth so as to visit the uncle at midnight, take the will out of his safe and pour poison in his water glass.

Ruth, under the hypnotic spell of Prof. De Monti, does what is asked of her. The uncle, however, awakened by the noise in his room, watches all this as if spellbound. He tries to rise two or three times, but falls back on the pillows. As soon as Ruth leaves the room he rises, rings the bell and calls for help.

The hypnotic spell has been broken. Ruth is in her room and is much surprised when called by her uncle and accused of having tried to poison him. He denounces her as a murderess and orders her from the house. Hearthroken, she leaves the room. Celeste stands in the doorway with a satanical smiles as she leaves the room.

She then conspires to bring Ruth to a sanitarium so as to have her out of the way permanently. Ruth's intended, however, follows on horseback. He attacks De Monti savagely with his riding crop and feils him to the ground. A policeman appears on the scene. The intended accuses De Monti of abduction; he is handcuffed and led away, while the young man lovingly attends to Ruth.

The last scene brings us to the uncle's sickroom. The doctor is in attendance. The young man enters and quickly explains all that happened. The uncle asks for Ruth; she is brought into the room and lovingly clasped in his arms. De Monti is next brought in. Just then Celeste enters. De Monti accuses Celeste, who, seeing that the game is up, takes the poison and before anyone can prevent it, drinks it to the last drop. Length, 965 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

DIFFERENT RULERS OF THE WORLD.—This is one of the cleverest trick pictures which has ever been put on the market, and as a means of entertainment it is without a peer, for it shows all the rulers of the world in caricature, embracing the pet hobby for which each one has become famous.

In the first picture we see an old conjuror appear upon the stage accompanied by two assistants, who place a large frame in the foreground. Then they take some boiling fluid from a pan and by the aid of magic they form the bodies of each one of the rulers in characteristic attire. This accomplished, they next proceed to make the heads, and out of the pan come the funny pictures of each ruler. The heads are then placed upon the shoulders of their owner and the grotesque group forms a very amusing sight. Length, 426 feet.

WOOD FLOATING IN MORVAN.—In this film the public will enjoy a rare treat, for aside from its instructive qualities, it is a marvel of grandeur from a scenic point of view. In the first picture we see the men hewing down the large trees and sawing them into small logs which are thrown into the swiftly moving stream and carried to their destination many miles away. The wood is then dragged ashore and piled in heaps to dry, after which it is loaded on flat boats and sent to Paris where a large portion is nsed as fuel in bakeries on account of the excessive heat derived from it. Length, 459 feet.

THE EVIL SPIRIT IN A GIRLS' BOARDING SCHOOL.—At this select school for young ladies everything is running along smoothly and the pretty students give their teacher very little trouble, for their deportment is perfect and the discipline of the school is above reproach. The tranquil aspect of the place is soon changed, however, by the introduction of a vivacious Miss who is bubbling over with deviltry, and by her many escapades soon earns the title from her more docile companions, as the evil spirit.

We see the scholars going for their daily walk to the woods, under the careful guidance of the exacting old Matron, who, upon arriving at the destination lets the girls romp and make merry, while she herself does a little sketching of the beautiful surrounding landscape. The girls come too near the easel and in their mad rush they upset the whole thing, which incurs the uncontrollable wrath of the old Matron, who orders them to immediately fall in line, and cutting the recess short, she starts to lead them back to the school. As they are going along the road and the Matron is deeply absorbed in a book, a crowd of young male students put in their appearance and fall in line with the fair co-eds, each fellow taking a partner. After having a delightful walk the girls suddenly disappear, leaving the boys to play the joke on the Matron and follow her to the school. When the latter turns and discovers her male companions she is horrified and after denouncing the boys in no mild fashion, she starts out to search for her disobedient charges. Finding them in the wood enjoying their young lives to their heart's content, the sour old Matron forces them to fall in line and follow her to the school, where, after a severe lecture she sends them off to bed without any supper. The rollicking girls enter the dormitory and as soon as the teacher leaves them alone they start a pillow fight, and are just having the time of their lives with the feathers flying like snow when in walks the old Matron again and puts a stop to the fracas. She then takes the leader and locks her in a private room, but the latter is not there long before she discovers her sweetheart waiting for her under the window. The youth climbs up to the room, and as the pair of young lovers are just forming a scheme to elope the Matron again puts in her appearance, this time accompanied by the young lady's indignant father, who has come to the school to learn the cause of all the trouble. Upon discovering the young man in the girl's room they throw up their hands in holy horror, but the youth steps up and confesses the nature of his visit, whereupon the father gives him the hand of his daughter with his blessings while the cross old Matron offers up thanks that she is rid of the bane of her life. Length, 623 feet.

TRUE TO HER FIRST LOVE.—This little silent drama reveals an interesting story in which the central figure is a good woman who remains steadfast in her love for her departed husband, but having a little son, she finds it a difficult matter to shoulder the responsibilities of raising him without a man as head of the family. There is a youth in the village who is in love with her, and fortunately is very fond of the little boy, who in return for his many kind acts shows the young man that he favors him as a prospective step-father. After due deliberation on the matter, the woman accepts the young man when he proposes marriage to her.

The wedding day arrives and shortly after the ceremony when everyone is happy, celebrating the event, the bride who should be the happiest among the guests is in a moroseful state. The thought of her departed one seems to master her, and feeling that she can never forget her first love and he the same devoted wife to her new husband, she decides to end it all. Making a bolt from the midst of the merry throng, she rushes toward the sea, closely followed by her husband and little son, but before they can restrain her, she plunges into the water. The little boy dives in after his drowning mother, and after a hard struggle he succeeds in bringing her safely to shore. The prostrate woman is soon revived, and finding herself in the loving embrace of her husband and son, she becomes penitent for her rash act and vows that she will now strive to live for them alone, forgetting all the past. Length, 358 feet.

THE HAND OF JUSTICE.—An old man possessing a large fortune is stricken with a fatal sickness, and realizing that his days are numbered, he thinks about making proper provisions for his daughter Anna who is his only living heir. Having a friend who is a banker, and in whom he has implicit confidence, the sick man summons the latter to his side and herewith turns over every important paper and all his money, requesting the banker to hold the same until after he has passed away, when it must all be given to the young woman. The friend does as he is bid, but there is no witness to the affair save a servant who happens to be passing through the room and by a quick glance notices the unusually secret proceedings.

In the next picture we see the interior of the same home eight days later when the old millionaire is no more and the sorrowful daughter is reading a note which he left her, telling her to go to the banker, who will remit to her the large fortune left in his care. The girl does as she is bid, but to her great astonishment receives only a very small sum, for the supposed honest friend has embezzled her out of her large inheritance. In burning up some of the important papers the dishonest man makes a bad job of the affair, and his servant is fortunate in grabbing the documents from the flames before they are destroyed.

The distracted girl returns home and as she is nearly penniless she decides to give up the establishment and take cheaper quarters, for there seems to be no hope of her ever obtaining her money as there was no witness whom she could call upon to aid her in the hour of need. The servant who happened to see the transaction between his late employer and the banker, comes to the aid of the young woman. He is a member of a secret organization whose watchword is "justice" and at a meeting the young man puts forth the case of the impoverished girl. The society immediately takes action and through their agents they make the life of the dishonest banker unbearable, for everywhere that he goes he is confronted with the insignia of the organization which is a "hand," and he is ever receiving letters informing him that his life is in peril unless he returns the money to the proper owner. Finally the society kidnaps his daughter, after which they send him a letter informing him to meet the agents of the society at a given point and allow himself to be led blindfolded to their meeting place where upon receipt of the money his daughter will be returned to him and he will be set free, but failing to comply with the request, means death to both. At last he is cornered and taking the money he does as he is bid, and appears before the tribunal of justice where he gives the young woman what belongs to her, and his own servant who is also a member of the organization completes the missing fund by handing over the certificates which he saved from the fire. The imprisoned girl is released and with her father leaves the place, while the happy heiress well repays those who proved such beneficial friends in her time o ftrouble. Length, 1,010 feet.

INVISIBLE THIEF.—This picture, which abounds in funny situations, is a marvel for its tricks in photography and leaves the spectator spellbound with amazement over the many unique incidents which take place in the course of the story.

In the first picture we see a fellow bent upon perpetrating a theft, entering the room where, after drinking a potion from a bottle, he becomes invisible. We can just barely see the outline of the figure as it leaves the room and again he turns up near a fashionable dwelling where he again becomes invisible and entering the place, helps himself to all the valuables within reach. He then returns to his room and after changing his costume, goes down to the street where he steals a woman's pocketbook. A policeman who witnesses the dishonest act gives chase and soon catches the thief, but the latter has the upper hand, and just as he is entering his home, again he disappears into vapor, leaving the officer spellbound. The thief gets to his room and as the policeman makes an effort to come up the stairs to apprehend him, the culprit in spirit form grabs everything in the place and hurls it at the officer's head. The latter at last realizing that there is little use in pursuing the thief, gives up the battle and beats a hasty retreat, leaving him to resume his normal state and enjoy the luxury of his spoils. Length, 377 feet.

A KIND HEARTED TOUGH.—A tough young fellow is seen prowling aimlessly around the street when he happens to meet a girl who bears the furrows of trouble and sorrow upon her brow. The youth who tries to start a little flirtation, but without success, becomes curious, so follows the unhappy looking young woman and sees her enter different places in search of employment, but at each one she is unsuccessful. Finally she gives up in despair and starts for home with the young fellow trailing closely behind her. Arriving at her destination, the crestfallen girl enters a poorly furnished room on the ground floor, and the curious youth peering through the window at once realizes the cause of the girl's unhappiness, for there on a bed lies her sick mother who is waiting for her daughter to return with some money, that she might buy some nourishing food. When the young woman comes into the room and is compelled to acknowledge to the sick woman that she is without a cent, it nearly has a fatal effect upon the poor old invalid, but in her dire distress she has only encouraging words for her unhappy daughter. The young tough whose heart is in the right place wishes as he gazes upon the pitiful spectacle, that he was able to assist them, but being without money himself, he is unable to lend any aid. Determined that he will scrape up a little money somewhere, he starts down the street, and as he is passing a mansion he notices a ladder leaning against the wall. Becoming curious, he climbs up, and there discovers a burglar rifling the room. The youth descends to the sidewalk and after removing the ladder, he sits down under the window to wait developments. Soon the thief has finished his little job and as he is about to descend, he is horror stricken upon discovering that the ladder has been removed. Having no other means of escape, he calls to the tough to replace the ladder but the latter who has a keen sense for business, strikes up a bargain with the thief, and compels him to share the spoils. The thief who is willing to do anything to escape, throws down a lot of money to the youth, whereupon the latter effusively thanks him and walks away.

Coming to the distressed people's home again, the tough looks in through the window and finds that the sick woman is alone and asleep, so quietly climbing in, he puts the money in the invalid's hand and is just about to make his departure when the unhappy girl enters. The latter is greatly surprised to find him there, but after a hasty explanation he convinces her that his mission is well meant. The proud girl refuses to accept the money and hands it back, but just at that juncture the landlady enters with her bill for the rent. The youth soon puts her anxiety at rest, for he hands the amount due and gives the rest to the sick woman who, with her daughter, shower him with their blessings as he beats a hasty retreat. Length, 587 feet.

THE PEASANT PRINCE.—Years ago, in Southern France, when knighthood was yet in flower, back in those days when men settled their differences with their swords, there lived a poor peasant family, Deuval by name. Like many of the poorer peasants of the day, the father was employed by a wealthy land owner as gardener, or caretaker of these vast estates.

Not only was M. Deupont blessed with wealth and title, but he was the father of two beautiful daughters, Pauline and Beatrice. Pauline was a sweet girl of eighteen, whose nature was like the flowers among which she was raised. With golden hair and dark eyes, her lips were as though moulded after Cupid's bow, and as red as a cherry. Many were the young men who sought to win her hand, but to no avail. Pauline was yet to find the one she loved and in whose keeping she must place her future life. She was indeed nature's child, and possessed of that magnetism none could resist.

Beatrice, her sister, was just the reverse. She had dark hair and eyes and was fair of face, but failed to possess the charm which would make her attractive to those with whom she came in contact. One could easily see she was jealous of her sister.

On adjoining estates to that of M. Deupont lived two young knights, who each in turn had tried hard to win the hand of Pauline, but each, as his turn came, had failed. Glaris, the less conceited of the two, had at last turned his attention toward Beatrice, while Beausant was as persistent as ever, and flattered himself that he would yet claim the heart of the beautiful Pauline.

In one corner of M. Deupont's estate stood a vine-clad little cottage overlooking a wooded ravine where flowers of many species grew in abundance. Here lived the gardener, Deuval, and his family, father, mother and two children. Claude, a young man nearing his twenty-first birthday, and his sister, Elleen, a young girl of sixteen. Claude, a nice looking chap, with blue eyes and long curly hair, had from boyhood spent his time with brush and easel until he was a master hand. Although an unknown artist, many were his paintings that found their way into the salons of the wealthy. Claude meets Pauline and falls in love with her.

Beausant, having again been rejected by Pauline, swears revenge, and having heard of Claude's love for Pauline is not long in arranging his plans. He and Glaris arrange a meeting at the latter's home, and there Beausant writes a note requesting Claude to call immediately, as he, Beausant, has very important news for him. A messenger is at once dispatched to Claude's home with the message.

Arriving at Glaris' home he is told of their plans. He, Claude, is to disguise himself as a prince, and as such Beausant and Glaris will introduce him into the home of Pauline's father. Claude at first refuses, but when he is reminded that he will be near the woman he loves he eagerly agrees.

Beausant selects a beautiful costume, and Claude is soon transformed from a poor peasant into a handsome prince. They now proceed arm in arm to the home of M. Deupont, where Claude is to be introduced as Prince Rudolph, son of a royal family.

When M. Deupont receives the card announcing the arrival of the prince he is overjoyed at the honor thus bestowed upon his family, and at once extends invitations to his friends. They have all assembled when the prince arrives. After acknowledging the introduction Claude offers Pauline his arm and they lead the way to the banquet hall.

Beausant is so far delighted with the success of his plan, but he never ceases to watch Claude and Pauline. At the first opportunity Claude tells Pauline that he loves her. She listens until he has finished, and then with blushing cheeks she tells him that his love is returned. Beausant, who has been an unobserved witness, is almost crazed with jealousy and swears to get even with Claude.

After Claude has heard Pauline repeat that she loves him, he at once seeks Beausant and asks him to release him from his promise. But Beausant sneeringly refuses, and laughs when Claude pleads with him. Claude, realizing that it is useless to plead longer, walks up to Beausant, and with ungloved hand slaps him in the face. Both men draw swords, and a duel is immediately in progress. Claude, though only a poor peasant, is the master swordsman of the two, and soon disarms Beausant. Picking up the latter's sword he hands it back to him, and is about to depart when he is stayed by a light touch on his arm. Turning, he beholds Pauline at his side. She has been a witness to the duel and his splendid swordsmanship. With trembling lips she asks Claude the cause of the duel, and as he gently leads her away he tells her it was a misunderstanding and tries to reassure her the best he can.

Beausant, burning with jealousy and hatred for Claude, seeks Claude's father and tells him that Claude is on the grounds and wishes to see him at once. Fearing that some harm has befallen his only boy, the old man follows Beausant to where the prince and Pauline are strolling, and there Beausant points to Claude, saying, "There is your son—an impostor." The old man does not recognize Claude at first, but when they are face to face the gardener sees it is his boy. Pauline tries to convince them that there is a mistake, but Claude, who can hear it no longer, tells Pauline that it is true. That he is not Prince Rudolph, but Deuval, the gardener's son.

During the excitement M. Deupont and the ladies have come upon the scene and have witnessed it all. Pleading with Pauline for forgiveness Claude is led away by his father. When he arrives home he is almost frantic with grief, and tells his mother how, in his eagerness to be near Pauline, he has lost his only chance of gaining her love. Unable to see him suffer, his mother, unknown to Claude, goes to Pauline and tells her all. Pauline, who is true blue, says she will go to Claude at once, which she does. She finds him at his easel, and there on the canvas is a likeness of herself. Claude studies the face on the canvas, and is about to proceed with his work when he hears a slight noise behind him. Turning, he beholds Pauline, the girl he loves. It is not long until they are in each other's arms.

Beatrice, suspecting her sister's visit to the peasant cottage, tells her father and mother, who follow Pauline, and arrive just in time to see her in the arms of Claude. In anger M. Deupont disinherits Pauline and tells her that he never wishes to see her again. At first she pleads with her father, but finding it is of no use she returns to the arms of the man she loves.

After having won Pauline as his wife, Claude is not long in ascending the ladder of fame, and now as he sits at his easel there is a loving voice ever near to cheer him in his work. It is Pauline talking to her "Peasant Prince." Length, 1,000 feet.

Omar, a desperate man, whom he has offended, starts a conspiracy and tries to murder him. He manages to escape in his night clothes and, as he is fleeing for his life, opportunely meets the dervish, to whom he begs for help. The dervish takes the ring and wishes the Caliph back to a cobbler again. Back to his original vocation, he sits contentedly working at his bench, never wishing to be a Caliph. Length, 585 feet.

SKI-ING TOURNAMENT AT ISHPEMING, MICH.—The first scene shows the contestants polishing their skis, preparing for their jumps. After they are ready they start one at a time down an incline to gather momentum and then shoot upward into space, their jumps being measured after they are through. The measurements are for height and distance. A very interesting Winter scene. Length, 345 feet.

THE BIRTH AND ADVENTURES OF A FOUNTAIN PEN.—An interesting and instructive film, depicting the different stages in the manufacture of fountain pens, beginning with the examination of crude rubber biscuits, then in turn grinding and washing the same, the process of drying and mixing (two-thirds rubber, one-third sulphur), the wonderful automatic covering machine, hand covering of mandrels with sheet rubber, packing of covered mandrels in soapstone, before vulcanizing; the vulcanizing oven, in which 5,000 pens are vulcanized at 308 degrees Fahrenheit; the stamping of the trademark on each pen; testing of the pens for leakage, and the making of gold pens. Length, 525 feet.

THE MAGIC FOUNTAIN PEN.—The pen draws sketches which change themselves slowly. First, Napoleon is drawn, this evolves into Emperor William, who in turn changes to King Edward, wearing a silk hat and smoking a cigar. This turns into a fine likeness of the Father of Our Country, George Washington. Then the smoking lamp on a pedestal changes itself into a young lady in one of the new style dresses and a large hat.

Then there is a warning to engaged couples; the dude and his girl have the kissing habit and finally turn into a pair of ducks. Then a flower pot is drawn and a little package of seeds. The seeds fall into the flower pot, a watering can is drawn, then raises up and the water pours out and sprinkles the earth in the pot. The sun comes out and its rays cause the seeds to sprout and in a few seconds a beautiful lily is grown.

The last sketch is just a circle, which changes shape until it becomes a picture of Bridget, the kitchen queen. The features then undergo a series of wonderful changes and, although it remains a complete picture throughout, finally turns into a society queen wearing a fashionable peach basket hat. Length, 475 feet.

SALOME CRAZE.—This picture is a screaming farce. It shows a Turkish prince at Riverview Park demonstrating the peculiar power of a certain liquid he has recently discovered.

He has an odd-looking spraying device, in which he puts the liquid. He then sprays it upon the heads and shoulders of his subjects upon the platform and they immediately start to perform the Salome dance.

The fun is at its height when a small boy squeezes through the crowd to see the sight. He decides that he must have the machine and waits around until an opportunity presents itself, then steals it.

The Turk soon discovers his loss and frantically rushes after the boy, who easily eludes his pursuer by dodging through the crowd.

He then sprays the liquid on everyone whom he meets, and it is most laughable to see these people moving along the street "doing" the Salome.

The boy is enjoying himself hugely, when up comes the Turk. As he is about to take the machine from the boy, he turns it upon the surprised Turk, who immediately starts to do the Salome, much to the amusement of the small boy and those looking on. Length, 500 feet.

FLIRTATION COLLAR.—This is a very funny story of a young lady who has a very annoying experience with her collar.

While walking along the street her collar becomes very tight and uncomfortable. As she tries to adjust it, the little side jerk she gives her head is very similar to what a coquettish young girl might do when trying to flirt, consequently, as she is a very attractive young lass, she is soon followed and accosted by a number of men, both young and old.

Of course, she gives them the "icy freeze," but nevertheless the persistency of the male flirts becomes so embarrassing that she tries to elude them and becomes so exhausted that she finally sinks down on a bench in the park.

She is hardly seated before a young man is at her side.

Cupid works in many guises, and this chance meeting proves love at first sight. Length, 500 feet.

CHICAGO FILM EXCHANGE

Mossler A. Building Chicago, Ill.

Here's a Story of Two Months Growth

On April 17th we placed our first shipment of International, also Great Northern Films in a theatre—the first dollars' worth of business we ever did as a Film Exchange.

Today we supply one-third of Baltimore's houses, not excepting those operated by Trust Exchanges, besides have placed service in 50% of the theatres in surrounding territory, all houses using high class service.

We Have Never Bought or Handled a Foot of Old Film

We often wonder why customers stay with us when Trust Exchanges and Spurious Independents offer "the same" service for one-half, or less than we charge. Looks like they believe we're on the level.

We're not ashamed of the Firms who make our Films, and we handle nothing but International products and Great Northern goods, for which we pay a higher price than either Licensed or Cheap Independent Films are sold for in open market. Our Films are fully Protected against Legal Action. We'll tell you something interesting if you write now.

Increase Your Patronage

High Class Film Service will help you, but it does not do it all. No matter how interesting the subjects you exhibit they do not attract the multitude that do not attend motion picture theatres because the pictures affect their eyes. What you should exhibit is high class pictures that are uninjurious to the eyes. Then you'll have them all coming your way. We can furnish you the right kind of films—and more. We have the device to attach to your machine which will enable you to obtain from these, or any other films, pictures that can't affect the eyes.

It is the Film Steadier

The latest and best attachment for motion picture machines ever devised. Besides enabling you to show perfectly quiverless pictures regardless of how old the film may be, its use assures a greater patronage, prolongs the life of films and prevents the wear and tear of machines. Already the press has commented upon it and now the public know that motion pictures uninjurious to the eyes are exhibited, and people are patronizing exhibitors showing such pictures. Why not, then get the Film Steadier aud secure this patronage? It fits any standard machine. Write for more particulars about it, or give us the name and make of your machine and let us send it to you now. Sent prepaid when cash accompanies orders, or will ship C. O. D.

the finest of the world's products—to bother with you. Can't be annoyed. He further says that the Independents are "making good" with Trust film secured before going Independent. What a joke. We only use their film for our very cheapest service, and if you can use them and will write us, we will rent you Six reels a week for $20.00, and allow you to sub-rent to one other exhibitor and allow you to earn whatever you can get; also will allow you one-half of rentals on all extra customers you get in addition to the first one. You can if you buy a GENERAL ELECTRIC MERCURY ARC RECTIFIER for your Moving Picture Theatre instead of rheostats or choke coils.

The Rectifier will take alternating current from the supply circuit and change it to direct current at just the right voltage for the arc. With the Rectifier you do not have any trouble with red-hot rheostats, your incandescent lights do not flicker when you start your arc, and you are not troubled with spots and "ghosts" on the screen. The entire outfit operates smoothly, safely and satisfactorily. Your patrons will be better satisfied because the pictures are better. You will be better satisfied because you are actually saving money. Assume that you operate your lamp 6 hours per day, and that you pay 10c. per kw. hour.

A glance at the following operating costs will show just exactly how much you can save in a year.

Direct Current and Rheostat, 26 amps. on the arc.	$515.00
Alternating Current and Rectifier, 26 amps on the arc	375.00
Saved in one year	$140.00

Alternating Current and Rectifier, 26 amps. on the arc	375.00
Saved in one year	$420.00
(This is 227% interest on your investment)

Box Ball Doubles the Profits of Your Theatre

$800 a Month With No Expense But Rent!

Moving picture shows pay out big money every week for employes, song slides and film rental. But Box Ball is a business that often brings in $200 in six days, yet has absolutely no expense but rent. One customer with four alleys took in $1,845.20 in 59 days.

Customers who spend only five cents in the theatre spend more than a dollar at Box Ball. Crowds are quickly fascinated with this new game. They never tire—the more they play the more they want to keep on playing. No one wants to quit loser, so he plays game after game—often spending hours when he first intended to spend a few minutes.

When the crowds are in your theatre give them free tickets for the first game. Every one will play at least once and many will become regular customers. Women and children play as well as men—they form teams and clubs and often spend a whole afternoon or evening.

Install one of these money-making games in connection with your theatre. Rent the room above or get the store next door. Put in two or more alleys and you will be simply amazed at the wonderful profits.

Your only expense will be rent. Players set the pins with a lever and the balls are automatically returned. One man to collect the money is all you need, and he can care for as many as ten alleys.

One game usually lasts six minutes with two players. At 5 cents each that's $1.00 an hour from every alley—you can figure the profit yourself. With ten hours' play two alleys will bring you $20 a day, or $120 every six days.

Send for our free booklet and learn how you can own one of these great money-making games for only a few dollars down and the balance payable from your profits. Remember—you pay just a few dollars down, and your profits the very first month should more than pay the entire cost of the outfit. Write for booklet at once. Address

Copyrighting Moving Picture Films —An Inconvenient Law.

The copyright law which came into force on July 1st, deals incidentally, of course, with the protection of moving picture films. As we pointed out in a former article, several weeks ago, moving picture films are protectable under the sub-section "J" of the Act: "Photographs." Now, in order to secure copyright protection of a moving picture film, it is necessary, according to this law, to deposit at the time of registration two copies of the film at Washington. This rule, as to the deposit of copies, applies generally to books, periodicals, lectures, maps, etc. —in fact, to all matter for which copyright protection is sought—so that the moving picture has to take rank with a mere map or photograph in sheet form.

This, on the face of it, is obviously a serious tax on the film maker. Just for a moment imagine the enormous expense that he is put to in having to make two extra complete copies of every subject that he produces. It does not matter whether it be 100 feet long, 200 feet long, or even a thousand feet. The rule of the law applies, and it can readily be calculated that copyright protection on moving picture films is liable to be an almost prohibitively expensive luxury for the moving picture film maker. With some makers, the cost would be ruinous.

It has been represented to us by several moving picture film makers that the law, in this respect, is a great injustice for the moving picture film maker, and that a way could or might be found by the authorities at the Washington Copyright Office whereby, whilst the letter of the law could be complied with, the cost of doing so to the film manufacturer would be considerably reduced. In other words, that instead of being required to deposit two entire copies of each film, strips only of a subject are all that are essential in order to secure identification of a subject, and, consequently, registration and protection.

We therefore suggest to those in charge of this matter at Washington that some such regulation as this could be made. The film makers are anxious to meet every reasonable requirement of the law, but they feel that its literal observance would put them to an expense not contemplated by the draftsmen responsible for the wording of the Act. Moving picture prints are not so easily and inexpensively made as are copies from type or single negatives. But when these facts are recognized by the authorities at Washington, no doubt a special provision will be made to meet the reasonable requirements of the film makers.

The Independent Outlook.

To follow the trend of events of the Independent section of the moving picture field demands a very clear brain indeed, and some amount of prescience. Things happen or are about to happen and it therefore devolves upon plain newspaper people like ourselves to forecast their probable influence on the business. But this is a task from which, frankly, we recoil. And for a plain reason: that in the Independent ranks it is nothing but discord, uncertainty, disunion, lack of homogeneity and all the rest of the elements that go to make for failure.

Of course this kind of reading will please the sybaritic scoffer of No. 1 Madison avenue, who seems to derive his chiefest pleasure in life in alternately scolding Mr. Laemmle or Mr. Murdock; in fact, were it not for the existence of Laemmle and Murdock it is difficult to see how Brother Hoff could fill his almost amusing, if erratic, pages, for they are conspicuously deficient in any editorial reference to the moving picture as a technical or pictorial product; in fact, the last place where you can learn anything about the moving picture business as a business is in the pages of our esteemed contemporary of No. 1 Madison avenue, New York City, U. S. A. But this is a digression. We are concerned as the one and only representative moving picture publication in this country, for the success of all reputable sections of the moving picture industry. The future of one of them is clear according to another article in this week's "World." But what of the other sections? What of the Independent renters, the Independent manufacturers, the independent importers; in fact, of all the elements that go to make up the non-licensed part of the business? An Independent Film Service Association seems to have been started. It has not done much up to the present. There is talk of the Independent manufacturers combining for purposes of mutual protection. And now comes the announcement that the International Company is adding fresh confusion to the situation by creating its own list of exchanges. Everything, therefore, makes for disunion rather than union; a state of affairs which, frankly, we deplore.

We deplore the state of affairs for two or three paramount reasons. In the first place they make for the success, neither of the individual, nor of the Independent section of the trade collectively. Disunion means destruction, and that is the plain English of it. It is no doubt true that imported pictures are not selling with anything like the success that they should. On the other hand some of the newer manufacturers are producing exceedingly good work, and therein seems to us to lie the principal hope of the Independent movement. Months ago we were the object of many reproaches from the Independent side that their cause was not adequately represented in these pages. We beg to say that we have done everything that is humanly possible to give the Independent a show in the columns of the Moving Picture World. We have allowed them to air their grievances. We have personally interviewed some of the leaders and advised them to get together for purposes of mutual benefit. We have, whenever possible, given their pictures a good word; in fact, we have done everything possible that a newspaper can do, in this manner, without actually managing all the Independent businesses. And some of them want managing badly enough.

Still we hope from the chaotic condition of affairs on the non-licensed side that something clear and definite may spring to the advantage of the Independent side in particular, and the business as a whole in general. At one time (indeed it was so recently as last Fall, before the gentle soothsayer of No. 1 Madison avenue appeared on the scene) the entire outlook was as black as that of the Independents is now. But we were confident that union would triumph, as it ultimately did, and we are equally confident now that the Independent importers, exchanges and manufacturers will ultimately get together for purposes of mutual benefit. The sooner they do, the better for themselves, the better for us, and the better for everybody.

Moving Pictures the Photographs of the Future.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

[From "Camera Craft" for June.]

I write this article for the readers of "Camera Craft," which is one of the most broadmindedly conducted photographic publications in the world, by way of a reply to some attacks on moving pictures that I have read with regret in some other photographic magazines of late. At the outset it seems to me that the attention of the photographic public, might, with profit, be directed towards the moving picture as a vehicle of pictorial expression, and as offering a means for technical improvements such as photographers might be able to impart to it.

In other words, while it is evident to most careful observers that pictorial stationary photography has practically reached the limits of its development and that very little else remains to be done towards extracting the possibilities from it, the moving picture, which is practically virgin ground to the pictorialist and the technician, offers unlimited scope for study, experiment and improvement. Technically good moving pictures are rare, and those having pictorial qualities are practically non-existent. The work is largely in the hands of men whose knowledge and experience have been gained by haphazard means.

Fortunately there are signs of a better state of things. In the production of a single film, the arts of the playwright, the producer, the photographer, the scene painter, are drawn upon to their utmost possible extent. Dealing only on this occasion with the work of the photographer, it is manifest that, in the matter of lighting, exposure, development of negative and positive and the prevention of defects, there is as much if not more real fundamental knowledge required than in any other branch of photography. The whole thing, indeed, is a matter of pure standardized science, without which failure is certain.

But we see so little real knowledge, that is, real science, applied to the production of moving pictures, that I draw attention to the matter in the hope that many of your photographic readers will devote their minds to it. The moving picture is at a turn of its career, and the demand for it is growing so strongly that a very wide field is open for good technical work in connection with it.

So with the pictorial phase: at present very little attention is paid to this end of the matter, but the moving picture to-day stands in as much need of pictorial improvement as did the stationary photograph of twenty-five years ago. We all remember what that was.

I trust that these few suggestions will be the means of stimulating ideas in connection with a most interesting branch of work. A great deal of nonsensical rubbish is written about moving pictures in the American press; but few pause to realize what a fund of care and intelligence is required to produce them, and what scope they offer for improved technical and pictorial treatment. One day, who knows? we may even see a moving picture salon!

Now for the polemical side of the matter. The moving picture, like all new things, has suffered from the biased and ignorant attacks of ill-informed writers in the press. Some unsuitable subjects have been produced and shown, whereupon irrationally minded persons have rushed into print and, arguing from the particular to the general, have condemned moving pictures as bad and objectionable, oblivious to the fact that, while the little that is bad may attract attention, the great that is good has passed unnoticed. I regret to note that some of these attacks have appeared in photographic papers and that they are signed by writers who should know better. I trust that this little protest will be the means of arresting further injustice in this direction. The case is somewhat more difficult in regard to the ordinary newspaper, which is simply a vehicle for inexcusable ignorance. However, much has been done to educate the American newspaper editor up to the fact that, in unreasonably condemning moving pictures, he is only manifesting his own ignorance on the subject to his readers; and so the evil is being cured by the simple process of applying a counter irritant. So far no defense of the moving picture has appeared in a photographic publication. This, therefore, is the first article of the kind that has been written, and I am hoping that its publication in the pages of "Camera Craft" will serve two ends, namely, to draw attention to the enormous technical and pictorial possibilities of this kind of photography, and protect it from the thoughtless and prejudiced attacks of the shallow smatterer.

EXHIBITORS SEEK PROTECTION.

We have before us a long letter from an exhibitor, complaining that he is not getting protection or being treated right by the Patents Company. Boiled down, his complaint amounts to this. There are only two shows in his town; both have been running licensed film, the full three reels each day, with illustrated songs. Now, this man's competitor has added an extra reel of old licensed film as an additional attraction and our correspondent thinks and says that the Patents Company should step in and compel him to go back to the three reels and even competition. In our opinion, if the Patents Company were to do this and dictate to the exhibitor how much or how little he should give his patrons, the next thing they would be asked to do would be to place their own men in charge of the show and turn over the profits to the exhibitor. From the letter we gather that both shows are charging five cents admission. This is too little for a show of three reels and two songs. Other places are getting the crowds at ten cents for the same show. One new and one old reel, with music or songs, is sufficient for a nickel, and we suggest that the two exhibitors, instead of trying to bankrupt each other by seeing who can give the most for the least money, get together and agree upon an equal division of the available reels. It is possible that this can be arranged so that each house has always a different show. This is the second letter within a week complaining in the same strain. It shows a deplorable lack of business acumen on the part of the exhibitor if he feels the need of an outside force to tell him how to run his business. Exhibitors in some localities have come together and agreed upon a policy. In this case, where there are only two concerned, it seems to us that the matter should be easily accomplished.

DET SKANDINAVISK-RUSSISKE HANDELSHUS.

The above title (do not try to pronounce it) is the firm name of a large importing house in Copenhagen, Denmark, which also does a large business in Russia. They present good credentials and ask us to put them in communication with American manufacturers who desire representation in these two countries. They seem to be one of the most substantial importing and commission houses in that part of the world and we suggest that American film and machine manufacturers get in correspondence with them. The address is Det Skandinavisk-Russiske Handelshus, Fiolstrade 20, Kjobenhavn, K, Denmark.

The Motion Picture Patents Company and Its Work.

A Retrospect and Appreciation.

Exactly six months ago a new power arose in the moving picture field. That power was the Motion Picture Patents Company. The strong man always receives respect, simply because of his strength. So it is with associations or combinations of individuals. They are respected in the exact ratio of their strength and power. The power of the Motion Picture Patents Company was made clear to the meanest capacity on December the 26th last, when there was published a document which contained the momentous provision: "All of the patents known by experts and authorities to have an important bearing on the manufacture of motion pictures and projecting machines have been purchased by a new concern incorporated as the Motion Picture Patents Company." Even the humblest individual engaged in the moving picture business could not fail to recognize the inherent power of this statement. It meant, of course, that there had entered the moving picture field a factor, possibly of predominance, and certainly of prominence, which was bound in the nature of things to exercise a great influence over the progress of the moving picture industry of the United States, if not of the world.

A NEW POLICY AND ITS NEED.

The policy of the new company was briefly outlined in succeeding paragraphs of the document from which we have quoted. It is interesting after this lapse of time to shortly summarise the principal lines of that policy. At the outset the company declared its purpose to be for "the general betterment of the entire business, from the manufacturer to the exhibitor." To that end it licensed the following companies to operate under its patent rights:

Biograph Company,
Edison Manufacturing Company,
Kalem Company,
George Kleine,
Lubin Manufacturing Company,
George Melies Company,
Pathe Freres,
Selig Polyscope Company,
Vitagraph Company of America.

It laid down that from January 1, 1909, licensed films were to be leased and not sold; that they were to be used only on licensed projecting machines; that an exhibitor using a licensed projecting machine must pay a license fee, and that each of the licensed manufacturers was to compete for the business of the country on the basis of merit alone. This document, as we have said, was issued at the end of last year. It is, therefore, opportune at the expiration of six months to glance at the manner in which this company has carried out its policy. In order to do this more effectively, we append a brief history of the condition of affairs in the moving picture field which existed before the formation of the company, merely premising that for three or four years prior to December last the moving picture business occupied in public esteem a position so offensive, so contemptible, and in many respects so degrading, that respectable people hesitated to have their names associated with it.

A NOTE OF HISTORY.

"The general dissatisfaction with conditions first resulted in a meeting of manufacturers in New York on November 9, 1907. The meeting resulted in a call for a general conference at Pittsburg on November 16, at which all the American and most of the foreign manufacturers were present or represented, together with the film renters. This conference was the nucleus of the United Film Service Protective Association, which adopted the following set of resolutions as their platform:

1. The renting interests enrolled as members to purchase film only from the association of manufacturers and importers.
2. No duplicating of film.
3. The elimination of sub-renting. (A sub-renter was defined as one who, for the purpose of profit, secures film from a renter and re-rents it.)
4. No film to be sold second-hand.
5. Retiring of film purchased after it has been rented for a period to be decided; the returning of this used film to the manufacturers.

"Another meeting was held at Chicago, on December 14, 1907, at which the platform was ratified and officers elected and a committee appointed to draft a set of by-laws. The rotten plank in the platform of the association and the cause of its collapse and of much acrimonious discussion and expensive litigation was the lack of unanimity among the manufacturers, based on rival patent claims. This led to the dropping of the terms 'United' and 'Protective' from the title and the formation of the Film Service Association at a meeting held in Buffalo on February 8, 1908. At this meeting the renters forming the F. S. A. signed allegiance to eight manufacturers licensed under the Edison patents, a rental schedule was adopted and really earnest effort was made to reform the business. The avowed motive of the eight manufacturers at this meeting was that the 'combination of interests was ninety-nine parts commercial and one part legal, the legal aspect being only a stepping-stone to accomplish the prime object of placing the business on a substantial footing for the ultimate benefit of all concerned.' It was but a short step in advance, but perhaps all that could have been accomplished at that time.

"The American Mutoscope and Biograph Company, feeling secure in their own patents, licensed four importers and headed the opposition, to which movement George Kleine, an important and aggressive factor, gave the name of 'Independents.' The dog-eat-dog policy of the competing factions developed a condition worse than before, notably in the competition between the film renters, and resulted in a call for another meeting in New York on July 11. The manufacturers met here in secret session and formulated a plan to unite the opposing interests, the Edison and Biograph companies having each become satisfied by this time of the strength of the other's claims to patent rights. A company known as the Motion Picture Patents Company was formed to acquire the rights to the Edison patents, the Biograph patents, and such other important patents as were considered to have an important bearing on the taking and projecting machines in general use or which were considered to have commercial value."—Moving Picture World, Jan. 16, 1909.

CHANGED CONDITIONS.

This brief historical resume of the conditions preceding the events of January last show clearly that the manufacturers were in a condition of antagonism one to the other; that the film renters were also disorganized; that the moving picture theater, as a place of entertainment, had fallen into a state of disrepute; that it seemed almost humanly impossible to lift it into popular esteem, and that, generally speaking, the entire business, on the very threshold of what promised to be a prosperous era, was threatened with premature decay through inherent rottenness. It can truly be said that if some such force as the Motion Picture Patents Company had not come into existence last year, conditions at the present time would have been so bad that the very existence of the moving picture itself would have been jeopardized. All over the country you had the public conscience revolting against the display of unsuitable, degrading, demoralizing, obscene pictures. You had the press antagonistic to the moving picture; you had the clergy similarly hostile; you had municipal and local authorities all over the United States avowedly unfavorable to the nickelodeon; you had overcrowded and bad theaters; in fact, you had about as bad a condition of business as could be imagined.

Yet, in a few short months, all this has been changed. You have even a censorship board, in process of becoming nationally established. Press and pulpit are no longer antagonistic to the moving picture. Municipal authorities are looking kindly on it; unsuitable theaters have been closed; existing ones improved; the quality of the picture has steadily advanced; and all around the condition of affairs, as contrasted with those in the dark days of last December, are full of distinct signs of progress and generally give promise of such a healthy state of things that it is safe to predict a very prosperous and profitable time, indeed, for the moving picture as a factor in the entertainment of the great American people.

CAUSES OF THE IMPROVEMENT.

To what do we attribute this remarkable improvement? To what particular force or agency? We cannot, in fairness, ascribe the improved condition of affairs to any one particular cause. Press, pulpit and public did their work of protest thoroughly well and earnestly. Municipal authorities and other public bodies and censors, enthused, and others all put their shoulders to the wheel with the object of bettering the condition of the moving picture. But even so, all these, either severally or collectively, would have failed in their object, if there had not been at hand some predominating power to guide and direct the efforts of those who were so earnest in their endeavors, but so comparatively powerless to enforce them. That power was, we unhesitatingly state, the Motion Picture Patents Company, the influence of which all through these last six months has certainly been cast in favor of the "general betterment of the entire business," which improvement, without the prestige and efforts of the company, would certainly not have progressed so far as it has done.

THE COMPANY AND ITS CRITICS.

No new enterprise was ever conceived in this world without provoking opposition. The Patents Company, as our pages week by week have testified, have had plenty of opposition. They have been called all sorts of names, which, to the credit of Mr. Dyer, Mr. Kennedy and their associates, have been borne with cheerful equanimity; they have been accused of depleting the pockets of the unfortunate exhibitor, who, however, in most cases is perfectly well able to take care of his own interests. They have come in for a share of that kind of gentle abuse and criticism which it is the peculiar privilege of Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Harriman, Mr. J. J. Hill and other successful business men to attract, but, as we have said, all this has been borne with delightful equanimity, because the Patents Company have felt consciously strong of their own legal position, and have had the determination, the power and the ability to carry out the business policy outlined in December last. To do the officials of the company credit, they have carried out that policy far more successfully than many anticipated they would. Mistakes and impolitic tactics there have, of course, been. But this sort of thing is inseparable from all new enterprises. "No man is perfect," said the late Professor Jowett, of Oxford, "not even the youngest of us"; and the Patents Company is a very young company, indeed.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

The statistical end of the company's business as it at present stands is of some interest. First of all, the associated manufacturers express satisfaction with their affiliation with the Patents Company. So far from the business having fallen, we are informed by these gentlemen that their returns have very largely increased and are increasing at the present time. The same may be said with regard to the licensed exchanges. At the outset of affairs something like 150 exchanges accepted a license from the Patents Company to deal, on specified terms only, in licensed films. A considerable number of that 150 have been eliminated, and thus at the present time there are only about 100 licensed film exchanges throughout the United States. These, again, so far as we can learn, are perfectly well satisfied with the condition of affairs. Now we come to the exhibitor and his license fee, about which matter such a great deal of discussion has taken place—some of it in our own pages. This article, however, being in the nature of a review, rather than that of criticism, it does not fall upon us to consider the license matter in any other aspect than that of mere matter of fact. In the United States the number of moving picture theaters is variously estimated as between 8,000 and 10,000. Of these, at the present time there are something more than one-half, that is, between 6,000 and 7,000, moving picture theaters which are paying the Patents Company a license fee for the use of their patented projecting machines. This fact shows with clearness and distinctness that, "trust" or no trust, combine or no combine, and equitable or the reverse, the Motion Picture Patents Company, in the month of July, 1909, is by far the most powerful factor in the moving picture field at the present time. Moreover, all the signs point to a continuance of that predominance.

We endeavored to show that the influence of the company has been beneficial to the industry as a whole. Let the reader of this article, however, perfectly well understand that the policy of this paper is not factional. We stand, as we have said over and over again, for the advancement of moving pictures, and not for any one section of the trade interested in them. Suppose that to-morrow (of course, we are in the domain of conjecture), but let us suppose that to-morrow a new power arose, entirely overshadowing or even obliterating the Motion Picture Patents Company, a power infinitely greater and mightier, which made for the betterment of the moving picture, and its sincerity were demonstrated to us, then we should give that power the support of this paper. Just as throughout the piece we have endeavored to support the Patents Company as a valuable factor in the situation, not sparing our criticisms of it, but always recognizing its value as a power and as a force. Of course, the company has enemies. Which company or which individual has not? And while we are here in the realm of conjecture, let us suppose the company absolutely disintegrated to-morrow, and as this number of the Moving Picture World saluted the eyes of the reader, the Motion Picture Patents Company, with all its organization and paraphernalia, vanished into thin air, what would happen? What would be the condition of affairs? Why, we venture to think that the last state of the moving picture industry would be worse than the first and that chaos would come again. The dark days of last December would return and a void would be created which it would be difficult to fill.

PRESENT POSITION OF THE COMPANY.

This view of the Patents Company and the work it has done and the position it fills and the influence it is likely to exert on the moving picture industry, is not only peculiar to ourselves who are writing this article, but it is a view shared very largely by the general public, by the press and by an enormous number of people who have only a small acquaintance with the moving picture industry. In other words, it is the opinion of those who are in the game but who are looking on it with clear eyes and unclouded brain. It is, in short, an intelligent public appreciation of the Motion Picture Patents Company and its work. But, more than that, it is also the view not merely of many of the Patents Company's supporters, but of many on the Independent side, including manufacturers, film renters and exhibitors, who, though they may not be working under licenses, yet have assured us over and over again that they recognize the value of the Patents Company as a predominating force in the moving picture field. A force, the influence of which has been exerted for the general good.

FRANK L. DYER,
President, Motion Picture Patents Company.

At this point it is perhaps useful to point out that the Patents Company is a patents holding company; that is to say, it does not of itself handle the pictures. It is really an administrative body controlling the use of the patent rights which it has acquired. The president of the company is Frank L. Dyer; its vice-president, H. N. Marvin; treasurer, J. J. Kennedy; secretary, George F. Scull, and the general manager, D. MacDonald, with whose names the readers of the World are now, of course, very familiar. The offices of the company are situated at 80 Fifth avenue. The company has its own separate autonomy, that is, it exists as an ordinary business concern. But it works in affiliation or in association with the manufacturers, and of these there are regular periodical meetings, in which business matters as affecting the general situation are discussed. In other words, the manufacturers both directly and indirectly contribute to the revenue of the company and in return they receive the protection for which they have contracted as licensees of the patents under which they work, patents which, of course, cover the use of cameras, perforated film and the like. Therefore, it is necessary, for the enlightenment of the reader, to emphasize this distinction, namely, that the Patents Company and the associated manufacturers, though working interdependently, yet also have independent and, indeed, individual existence.

GENERAL INFLUENCE.

A review of the work which the Patents Company has done in the six months of its existence, outside the mere conduct of its own business affairs at 80 Fifth avenue, would be incomplete if we failed to recognize the support which it has given to the censorship of moving pictures in New York City, and its influence in preventing the passage of absurd legislation at Albany; to its action in endeavoring to induce Mayor McClellan to take up a less tyrannical position towards the moving picture; to its work in helping to provide a means of better illuminating moving picture theaters, and generally to its policy of co-operation with public and private bodies in bringing about a more favorable recognition of the moving picture as a popular form of entertainment. That influence has, of course, been used through the press and in various other ways, and although it may not have always seemed good at the time, it has always, we are convinced, been exerted with the idea of promoting the general betterment of the entire business.

THE FUTURE.

So much for the past and present of the company; what of the future? The present indications point to a continuance of the policy that was inaugurated six months ago. As a business concern the company has fulfilled the expectations of its founders, and both collectively and individually the manufacturers are satisfied with the efforts that are made on their behalf. On these facts we are justified in assuming that the company will continue to be, as it has been during the six months of its existence, a foremost factor in the moving picture field, and that its influence will be cast on the side of "the general betterment of the entire business from the manufacturer to the exhibitor." It is clear, from the indications that we have given, that its policy will be carried out on lines that have already been laid down. Having control of the larger number of moving picture theaters of the United States, it necessarily follows that the class of pictures shown, together with the manner in which the various businesses are conducted, will be directly under the company's influence. This, from the public point of view, is a feature to be welcomed. The elimination of excessive competition, the prevention of the cutting of prices of licensed film, the gradual eradication of junk, and at the same time the uplift of the standard of quality, are matters well within the company's ability to carry out. All this, of course, is from the point of view of the public, whose standpoint we are endeavoring to take in this article. The public concerns itself, as a rule, very little with the agency by which it receives the goods for which it pays, so long as those goods are satisfactory in quality and price. On these grounds alone, therefore, it can be well conceived that, from the public point of view, the continued existence of the Patents Company and the conservation of its policy are things to be desired. The last thing the public wants is a reversion to the state of affairs of December, 1908, and frankly we welcome any agency which will prevent such a terrible set-back. On these grounds, therefore, it can be seen that the Patents Company has a strong force of public opinion at its back. Moreover, throughout the trade its competitive influence, we believe, will, in time, be regarded as distinctly beneficial.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

By F. H Richardson, Chicago.

CHAPTER X

FINDING THE FOCAL LENGTH OF LENSES AND FINDING THE SIZE LENS REQUIRED TO PROJECT A GIVEN SIZE PICTURE AT A GIVEN THROW.

Finding the focal length (commonly termed the "focus") of a lens is a very simple operation, but one very little understood by operators. To ascertain the focal length of a condenser lens, pin a sheet of blank paper on the wall opposite to, and removed at least ten feet from, a window through which comes strong light. Next, holding the lens as in Fig. 29 A, with the flat surface square with the wall, move it back and forth until the image of the window appears sharply defined on the paper. Holding the lens at point of sharpest definition, measure from its flat side to the wall, and this measurement is the focal length, or "focus," of the lens. An incandescent lamp will answer equally well for illuminant if not less than ten feet distant. Get sharp image of the lamp filament on the wall and measure as before.

Measuring focal length of projection lenses is done in precisely the same way, except that you must first make the central point between the two lenses (see Fig. 29 B) and measure from that point.

Finding the focal length of lens required to project a certain width of picture at a given distance is equally simple, though a dense, dark mystery to very many operators. Multiply the distance from lens to curtain, in feet, by width of picture opening (aperture plate in motion pictures and slide mat in stereo) and divide the result by size of picture desired. Result will be focal length of required lens, in inches. Example: What lens will project a 15-foot motion picture at 60 feet? Answer: 60 x 1 (aperture plate is 1 inch wide) equals 60, which divided by 15 equals 4, so we shall want a 4-inch lens. Example: What lens will project a stereo picture 15 feet wide at 60 feet? Answer: 60 x 3 (width of standard slide mat) equals 180, which divided by 15 equals 12, so we shall want a 12-inch stereo lens. This will not be absolutely accurate, since aperture plates are just a trifle wider than an inch and mats usually exceed 3 inches by about 1-16th inch. Moreover, cheap lenses are not ground absolutely accurate and there will be some variation there, too. But the rule answers for all practical purposes. The same result is attained by dividing the distance by the size of the picture and multiplying by the opening. In using this rule, don't guess at distances and expect accurate results. Measure from curtain to lens with a tape line, no matter if someone has "told" you it is a certain distance. Reject any odd inches in the measurement below six and add a foot if the fraction be more than six inches.

Before starting the day's run remove the projection lens and make sure there is no oil on its back lens. If there is, you cannot get a clear picture. When using a lens-tube, the position of the picture may often be shifted on the curtain as much as a foot, up, down or sidewise, simply by turning the tube around in the jacket. About once a month take the projection lens all apart and clean the lenses thoroughly by washing with wood alcohol and polishing carefully with a soft dry cloth or chamois. Because the projection lens looks perfectly clean and clear when you look through it is no evidence that it is so. Be very careful, however, to get the lens back just as it was, or you will have trouble galore. In projection work the lenses should be ground accurately enough to give clear, sharp definition, but beyond this, quality does not seem to count for very much in the motion picture lens. There is probably a difference, but the eye does not seem to be finely discerning enough to catch it. In the stereo lens, quality cuts more figure, but even here it is size that counts. A good, clear-cut stereo picture cannot be projected with what is known as a "quarter-size" lens, which is the article which usually (always, I believe, unless otherwise agreed) goes with the regular machine outfit. These lenses are a nuisance. A really good stereo picture cannot be projected with anything less than a "half-size" lens, and that is what you should by all means have. The road man should have stereo lenses for various distances and a motion picture lens jacket with lens tubes for various distances. Be very sure to have your picture in exact focus. The picture may look all right to you from the operating room, still, a fraction of a turn of the adjustment screw may improve it considerably. With the stereo it is a good plan to throw a picture on the screen before the show and get someone to work the adjustment screw for you while you go down in the house and direct him. Get it so that every detail comes out sharp and clear. A scene with grass, flowers, shrubbery or trees is best for focusing. Once set, it will, of course, remain so until disturbed. It is close attention to such details as this which marks the real operator. The "Oh, that's good enough" man never gets ahead—he oughtn't to! Knowing a thing does no manner of good unless you apply your knowledge—remember that.

Should one of the lenses of a projection lens get broken the whole lens is ruined. It cannot be replaced, or, at least, it would cost more than would an entire new lens. To test your motion picture lens for accuracy of projection, get a piece of clear mica four or five inches long and cut it the width of a film. Now with ruler lay it off both ways for two inches near one end with straight lines about one-eighth inch apart, scratched with the knife point, forming a sort of miniature checkerboard. Put this ruled portion over the aperture plate in exactly the position the film would occupy (as regards the tracks and tension springs), close the gate and turn on the light. Now focus the scratch marks on the curtain, and if they appear clear, straight and without distortion of any kind the lens is true and accurate. In making this test be certain the lens is clean, particularly that it has no oil on its inner end. This mica strip can be used every day before the show to test the focus and get it exactly right; but you must get it in the machine in exactly the position the film will occupy. In this relation let me say that the lens sometimes gets blamed for what is really the fault of a worn aperture plate. The variation of as little as 1-64th of an inch in the distance of the film from the lens as it passes through the machine will affect the focus. Now, it frequently happens that aperture plate tracks do not wear evenly. There may be a sort of bow, or, worse yet, double bow, in the tracks where the short spring contact comes, or the pressure of the tension springs may cause the outside or inside of one or both tracks to wear faster than the other side. These things have a decided tendency to cup the film in sucrh manner that it is impossible to, get the whole picture in focus. Understand, I do not mean by the above that 1-64th inch would make any difference provided the whole picture were moved that much to or from the lens, but the cupping I refer to causes one portion of the film to be nearer the lens than another, and this will not do, even though the variation be but the amount named. The film must be perfectly flat as it passes the aperture opening.

"Much to Learn."—"Spectator," in the theatrical trade paper, "The Mirror," says we have much to learn regarding dramatic production and direction. We cheerfully admit the soft impeachment. We are learning every hour of our lives, aud although we went through the business of moving picture making long before "Spectator" revealed himself as an authority, we are quite willing to learn something, even from him. Unfortunately, however, he does not seem to have anything to teach us, or anyone else.

H. A. Spanuth, who is well and favorably known among the trade through his connection with Miles Bros. for several years, will become assistant manager of the film department of Laemmle's New York office on the 19th of this month. Mr. Spanuth's genial personality and knowledge of the local trade will be a distinct asset to the new concern. Mr. Laemmle has picked his employees shrewdly even to the stenographer, Miss O'Keefe, who in time past used to smile at us from behind the railing in the office of the Film Import and Trading Company. The general manager of his film department is Mr. Maxwell, formerly with Miles Bros., who will exercise his experience and genial manner in creating an atmosphere of pleasantness in the Laemmle office which will no doubt be appreciated by the independent exhibitor. The office will be ready for business next week.

Levi, the slide maker, secured a special permit to monopolize that magnificent vessel, the Mauretania, while docked last week and we learn that he secured a magnificent set of slides for one of Chas. K. Harris' latest songs. Levi is doing great stunts in the song slide field for one who has only been in the business a matter of two years.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

My article of last week, in which I stated that the convention to be held in Atlantic City during the present week by the members of the Film Service Association was to be a love feast, was the subject of considerable sarcastic comment. While the declaration was not such as could give serious offense to anyone, I wish to state that my article did not state that the convention was to be a love feast. I gave due credit to a member of the organization for the statement, and from what I have been able to learn that member seems to have had the situation pretty well sized up. The Film Service Association is no longer a business organization. It is purely social in character, and while the programme for the convention may assume a formal character, in many respects it will be purely an arrangement of addresses in proper sequence so that each member will have an opportunity to express his view as to the past, present and future of the moving picture business as an individual. It is not likely that an attempt will be made to adopt resolutions that may in any way attack the Motion Picture Patents Company, or seriously criticize it, because the company has no official knowledge of the organization and to have such resolutions presented to it by its licensed exchanges might arouse a suspicion of disloyalty which might lead to some unpleasant complications.

I have written the above in an effort to clear from the minds of many that the re-assembly of the film exchanges is not a revolutionary step. It is true, many exchanges feel that in the five months of its existence the Patents Company could have accomplished more for them than it has, but there is a general feeling of patience and forbearance with the hope that within the next three or four months the Patents Company will make good. It is recognized that it is no easy matter to establish and systematize a body that is to directly control a hundred or more film exchanges and both indirectly and directly supervise eight or ten thousand exhibitors covering every State and territory in the union and many of them being located in remote corners of the great country. While this work of systematizing has been in progress complaints by the hundreds have poured in daily from manufacturers, film exchanges and exhibitors, most of which failed of remedy for the reason that the Patents Company was not in a position to successfully cope with the questions involved on account of an incomplete system. It is now stated that affairs are now getting in good shape and by the time the Fall season opens the licensed exchanges and exhibitors will be shown something.

* * *

The prevailing cry is, "Show us, we are from Missouri." In order to condense the sentiments I hear I will put them in my own language. It would be a good idea if the Atlantic City convention would put in some kind of form the real sentiments of its members. They need not necessarily be made public. Nothing can be gained by that. But if put in a form in which they can be properly placed before the Patents Company some good may be accomplished. There is not the slightest doubt that many exchanges have just complaints. It is a matter of public knowledge that scores of licensed exchanges have lost customers through loyalty to their contracts with the Patents Company. They have discontinued serving customers who have used Independent films with the licensed films. The exhibitors have gone over to the Independents and for less money than they paid the licensed exchanges have secured the use of both licensed and Independent films. In such cases the Patents Company has not protected the licensed exchanges as they were led to believe they would be.

It is also a fact that cases of sub-rentting or loaning of films by exhibitors is ridiculously prevalent. Exchanges are prohibited renting films to exhibitors who sub-rent or loan. This system has become so general that were the exchanges to adhere to the regulation they would not have enough business to pay the rent, much less buy new films and meet other expenses. Several exchange men say they have appealed to the Patents Company on this score, and the only satisfaction they have received has been an admonition to cut off the service of any customer who sub-rents or lends films. Now when the exchanges have done this to an extent where they see a loss of practically all their business stares them in the face, it seems quite reasonable to expect the Patents Company to step in and revoke the licenses of the offending exhibitors. I anticipate the answer to this: Well, if you revoke the licenses you drive the exhibitors to the ranks of the Independents. True, but to this the exchanges formulate an effective answer. First, when an exhibitor breaks his contract with the exchange he at the same time violates the conditions upon which his license is granted and the Patents Company should be just as active in dealing with him as the exchange. Second, the Patents Company should put itself on record as upholding the loyal exchanges and exhibitors, and show by example that it has full confidence in and can substantiate its claims. Third, this record is ineffectual if only in words. Deeds only can count. Fourth, the Patents Company should refuse to relicense an exhibitor who violates the license conditions at will. If it placed itself effectively on record in this respect there would be less jumping back and forth. There is an amazing list of exhibitors who leave the licensed exchanges and go to the Independents on advance information of a line of subjects which they think will better suit their tastes and go back to the licensed exchanges when they think they have skimmed the cream of the Independents. Fifth, it is unfair to both the licensed exchanges and exhibitors that they should be prohibited from renting and using Independent films when Independent exchanges not only supply their customers with any kind they want, but by widespread advertising proclaim their determination and ability to do so. A prominent exhibitor said the other day that he was getting tired of paying two dollars per week for the privilege of displaying a framed Patents Company license in his place when an exhibitor near him was getting both kinds of films and saving in rental price as well as the two dollars per week. It was suggested to him that the other man was probably getting old films that were issued before the Patents Company went into existence. To this he replied that the same story had been given him time and again by his exchange, but he knew of unlicensed places showing licensed films that were less than two weeks old, and it would not require a Pinkerton force to find some subjects of more recent date.

Still other licensed exhibitors complain of a lack of good faith. They say that when they took out their licenses they were led to believe (some say they were assured) that it gave them protection to the extent that an unlicensed exhibitor in their locality would not be allowed to use licensed films and the number of licensed exhibition places would be restricted according to the locality. Neither of these understandings have been carried out.

I have endeavored to adhere to the original complaints as given me with strict fidelity. There should be no misunderstanding about the matter. There is a strong under-current of discontent that should be appeased in justice to those who are loyal to their obligations. The conservative stand taken by many of the complainants commands respectful attention. They do not ask for an abolition of the Patents Company or an annihilation of the Independents, but insist upon the former carrying out and enforcing its original policy. It has been pointed out that the Patents Company at one time declared it was not intended to deal unjustly with or crush anybody, but it was determined that only licensees of the Patents Company should use its films and machines. The licensed exchanges, in brief, complain that they have lost, and are daily losing, business through the failure to carry out this determination. The licensed exhibitors say that through this failure they are not getting what they pay for.

I heard an interesting discussion the other day between an exchange man and one of the men "higher up." The former admitted that some customers who had left him to go to the Independents had returned to him. "Then what are you kicking about? That shows you were giving the better service." The exchange man replied, "That is all very well. If the other exchanges were not renting both kinds of films I would not have lost the customers and I lost just so much money while they were away because I could not get customers to take their places from the Independent exchanges at the same price they were paying me."

An exhibitor suggested the other day that the only advantageous method for the licensed people is to have a convention of representatives of the Patents Company, the film exchanges and the exhibitors. He believed that the situation was not thoroughly understood by the people in control and a convention for the purpose of talking over affairs would no doubt aid all concerned. Individual complaints seem to count for nothing. Sometimes they are not properly presented. At other times they are received by subordinates who either distort them, or do not give them proper consideration. Arbitrary methods are too prominent, and they seldom accomplish good. Arbitration has frequently worked remarkable beneficial results. OLIVER.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

My definition of dignity which I gave on this page two weeks ago seems to have caused some unpleasantness around about Forty-second street, where I am accused of having insulted actors and actresses for simply telling them that they did not lose dignity in working before a moving picture camera, and that they were not entitled to be considered dignified, unless they worked. Precisely where the insult in all this lies, I do not know. Certainly I do not mean anything intentionally insulting. Everybody who knows me, writes me down as one of the mildest mannered of men, although, according to my self-constituted mentor of No. 1 Madison avenue, I am a "titled" scribe. Evidently it is a very shocking thing in this republican country to have a title. As I am the proud possessor of a title, I wonder if any American heiress is open to trade? Don't all speak at once.

To be serious: the theatrical papers do not seem to realize that the enemy is at their gate, so to speak, and that the talking play and the singing play are being challenged for the balance of public favor, which means dollars and cents, by the silent play, with or without phonographic accompaniment. In other words, from the purely business standpoint, it is a question whether the common or garden actor or actress would not be wise, when they get the opportunity, to devote the whole of their time and talent to moving picture work? And what is more, as in the case of Miss Elita Proctor Otis, who avowedly worked for the Vitagraph Company, the fact of actors and actresses accepting moving picture engagements should be publicly announced. Where's the harm?

If you look down the theatrical papers you do not see actors and actresses advertising that they work for moving picture theaters. Why is this? Yet, hundreds of them do. Now and then you see a mysterious paragraph going the rounds of the papers, hinting that such-and-such a performer in such-and-such a film is a well-kown Broadway actor or actress. Why not say so? Why not give their names? There is nothing to be ashamed of in working for a moving picture house. On the contrary, I should think, judging by the Pathe standard, it is something to be proud of. I know that I am a great man, an able man, a distinguished man, and all that kind of business, perfectly well able to edit the "Dramatic Mirror" as well as its present conductor, yet I am rather pleased, indeed rather proud, to be associated with this paper, because I like moving pictures and believe in them and look upon them, except in a minority of cases, as offering a better and cheaper entertainment than the average theater or vaudeville house.

And that is the point. The great paying public show by their attitude these recent years, both in this country and in Europe, that they no longer hold the talking stage in that veneration that they once did. They stay severely away from the regular theater and patronize the moving picture house in their hundreds of thousands. Consequently, a new condition of things arises entirely. Now, has the Broadway actor or actress to stand on his or her dignity and refuse to work for the silent stage simply because the conditions of employment are varied, or are they to live on dignity and air?

What possible harm or insult is there in openly discussing a point like this? I fail to see any. If I am wrong in looking upon the actor or actress in any other light than that of a workman or workwoman, then I will apologize, do penance in a winding sheet, and hold a white candle in my hand outside of the Players' Club in Gramercy Park. You know, ladies and gentlemen, it is not so long ago since, by a law of a European sovereign, actors were classified as rogues and vagabonds, and even in many sections of society to-day they are not looked upon with the strongest favor. I have no sympathy with this kind of attitude, any more than I have with its antithesis, namely, the assignment of the business of acting to a place amongst the professions, such as the law, the church, the army, or the navy, or medicine. Then, again, there is the use of the much-abused word "artist" in this connection. Some people deny the right of an actor or actress to call himself or herself an artist. This is a debatable point.

The whole thing, to my mind, is a very simple matter. In this world we are judged by the quality of the work we do, and I assume that every actor or actress, the same as every newspaper man or any other kind of worker, has no claim to quarrel with this kind of classification. In a democratic community the attempt to rule off people into distinct classes is opposed to the spirit of things. Your eminent author to-day may be issuing the best-selling novel of the season; tomorrow he is contributing an anonymous review or criticism to a newspaper. Does he lose dignity on that account? I think not. The actors or actresses of the Comedie Francaise who have worked for Pathes are presumably thereby not prejudiced for subsequent work at the Paris theaters. Take the case of the historic pageant which is a feature just now of continental Europe. Well-known producers, actors and actresses worked in these things during the intervals of their regular stage duties. Do they lose dignity by it? I think not.

I do not want to unduly labor this point, but what I wish to emphasize is the fact that there appears to be a disposition on the part of film manufacturers to engage the best class of talent for their moving picture plays. The talent, on its side, however, does not seem to be offering itself, possibly on the grounds of professional punctiliousness. Now, how is this little chasm to be bridged over? How is the headliner of the talking play to be made the headliner of the moving picture play? How is the newspaper recognition, the public applause, and the like, which are the concomitants of acting, to be switched over to the moving picture field? That is a point which I think is open for discussion.

A great deal of discussion has taken place as to the attitude of theatrical managers, actors and actresses towards the moving picture. The managers are alleged not to like the moving picture business because it interferes with their business. Some of the more sensible of them have fallen into the new condition of things, and, instead of keeping their houses dark, or putting on unattractive plays, have adopted the moving picture as an attraction for the public. What the theater manager is not too proud to do, I venture to think, pari passu, the actor and actress should not be. There, ladies and gentlemen, is the whole case in a nutshell. I stated the case as plainly and concisely as I could two or three weeks ago, with the result that I was called down for my attitude. A reconsideration of the matter, however, prevents me from taking up any other position. So I re-state the case now, not in any desire to insult anybody, but rather by way of sympathy with high-class actors and actresses, whom I and many others interested in the moving picture will be glad to see working before the camera.

THE HEAT AFFECTS THE EXPRESS COMPANIES.

The Kent Film Service, of Toledo, Ohio, send us the following remarkable letter which they have received from their express company with the request that we suggest some plan of action to have the absurd ruling withdrawn:

Toledo, Ohio, July 13, 1909.

Kent Film Service Co.,
Toledo, Ohio.

Gentlemen: Effective August 1, 1909, we are permitted to accept moving picture films only when in heavy metal cases (excepting tin) enclosed in wooden boxes.

They must also bear a label printed on red paper not less than three inches square, reading as follows:

MOVING PICTURE FILMS.
Must not be loaded or stored near a radiator, stove or other source of heat.

The above for your information. Kindly acknowledge receipt of the new instructions, and oblige,

Yours very truly,

(Signed) AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.,
Geo. D. Hartman,
General Agent.

It is reported that the other express companies are issuing similar instructions. We have racked our brains in vain to discover any reason why the express companies should issue such an order. Considering the thousands of dollars that they have collected from the exchanges it seems hardly possible that they would seek to cut off that source of income. It would be impossible for the manufacturers and exchanges to comply with the ridiculous requirements in the short time specified. Where can the exchanges procure thousands of "heavy metal cases (excepting tin)" in two weeks' time? If there is a nigger in the woodpile he must be laying low with an ample supply of these cases on hand. But why should the express companies take this stand now when they have carried thousands of packages for years without a case being reported of combustion from the heat of a radiator or any heat-giving source such as is found in an express office? Now that non-inflammable stock is coming into general use it might be surmised that the manufacturer of that stock was behind the boomerang, but the order does not exempt N. I. film.

We would suggest that every manufacturer and exchange man register a protest with the express companies and we will do our best to agitate a repeal of the order. Meanwhile we will endeavor to trace it to the source and discover the reason for the absurd ruling. Truly the path of the film man is hard. No sooner does one trouble seem to be about settled than another springs up.

LUMIERE AGAIN A PRODUCER.

This old stablished house which was one of the pioneers in the film manufacturing field, and whose subjects in years gone by were in great demand, have again started to produce. The first shipment of their printed film is now in New York and it is the intention of their New York agent to begin releasing one reel per week about August 1st. It is needless to say that the house of Lumiere would not enter the field if they were not prepared to issue subjects that will compare in photographic and artistic quality with any on the market. They have the facilities and they have the means. Their reputation is already made and we look forward to seeing some film subjects from this house which will gladden the hearts of the independent exchanges and give them fresh encouragement. Particulars as to prices, release dates and subjects may be obtained from The Lumiere Co., 37 East 27th street, New York.

A NEW CANADIAN FILM EXCHANGE.

The Great-Western Film Company, which has opened spacious offices in the Kennedy Building, Winnipeg, Manitoba, announce that they now have their film renting exchange in excellent running order, and are prepared to give the exhibitors of Canada a service of the highest quality and in a most satisfactory manner. A complete line of accessories such as machines, etc., are carried in stock at all times. The company, which includes some of the most well known business men of Winnipeg, are prepared to take care of a very large amount of business in Western Canada. Their offices are under the management of Mr. J. A. King, who is also a member of the company, and exhibitors can rest assured that only good business relations and the most courteous and intelligent treatment will be waiting for them from Mr. King.

"HALLBERG" EQUIPMENT FOR BULLOCK & DAVIS' NEW ORPHEUM THEATER AT NEW LONDON.

The Orpheum Theater at New London, Conn., has now been equipped with a special "Hallberg" Economizer installation. The electric light company delivers three-phase, 104-volt, 60-cycle current at New London. Messrs. Bullock & Davis, who have had a great deal of experience in securing perfect results on the screen, decided that they would invest in a device for changing the three-phase current into direct current for the moving picture and stereopticon lamps. After careful investigation Mr. W. S. Davis, the manager, placed the order for one "Hallberg" A. C. three-phase to D. C. Economizer with a capacity to operate two dissolving lamps and one moving picture lamp at the same time. The Economizer is provided with a special compound winding which maintains an absolutely steady current, no matter if one or all three lamps are burning. The saving is about 50 per cent., but the light is the most perfect ever produced. Messrs. Bullock & Davis' theater is perhaps equipped with the most modern devices of any M. P. theater in the East, and no expense has been spared in giving the patrons first-class service in every respect. Even the Economizer was specially designed and built for this theater according to specifications of Mr. Davis.

Phil Lewis, of the Chicago Film Exchange, is in town with the intention of opening a New York office for the sale of the Tiger and Phoenix films, for which they are selling agents. Some of their films which we saw on the screen in an independent exchange last week were of excellent quality, the photography being indeed above the average.

Mr. Alfred H. Moses, Jr., who was formerly general manager of the Co-operative Film Service of America, and manager of the St. Louis office, is now manager of the Consolidated Film Co., of New York. They have fitted up the cutest thing in film exchanges in the rear of the handsomely appointed offices of the Film Import and Trading Co. at 127 East Twenty-third street. Mr. Moses is very busy getting ready to handle a large amount of business, which he feels sure of getting, and as he has many friends among the exhibitors we believe that he will not be disappointed.

Comments on the Week's Films.

SKI-ING AT ISPHEMING, MICHIGAN (Vitagraph).

Until we saw this picture, we were under the impression that the European sport of ski-ing was not indulged in in this country. The Vitagraph Company, in this picture, probably enlighten others besides ourselves. During the hot weather that we recently had and are having, a Winter picture such as this comes as a positive relief. Moreover the subject is novel. The sport of ski-ing consists in gathering momentum on the large skate-like shoes the contestants wear, and then taking a great jump or leap through space, the measurement of the jump deciding the winner. The sport appears to be full of excitement, and the exercise must undoubtedly be beneficial. As an example of high speed moving picture camera work this film deserves every praise, the pictures of the ski-ers being in every case clearly defined. It is quite a new sensation to see a man as it were on very large skates practically flying through the air, for that is what it amounts to. As the sport takes place on snow covered hills it can be seen that the subject is one affording novelty and variety. The effects of snow are extremely well rendered, and the subject is not without its humorous side, when the ski-er instead of hurtling through space, falls down and is unable to resume his flight. An uncommon and interesting film.

"ONLY A DREAM" AND "A SURE CURE" (Gaumont).

Mr. Kleine releases this week two intensely comic subjects which are also decidedly novel. In the first of them we have a Mephistophelian-like individual inflicting the most curious surprises upon two men, one of whom refuses to give him alms. He cannot kill the curious creature, who seems to bear a charmed life. He disappears and reappears at the most inopportune moments and generally disports himself as his Satanic majesty is generally supposed to do. The ingenious manner in which this figure is made to come in and out the film argues great skill by the Gaumont photographers. It ends by the merchant and his servant awakening from a dream in which they have been troubled by this uncanny visitor. The picture is extremely diverting and appears as a very welcome comic relief. So, too, does the other Kleine subject, "A Sure Cure." An unfortunate man suffers from hiccoughs and a number of extremely drastic remedies are tried on him with the idea of expediting his recovery. They even shoot a cannon in his presence. But this has no effect upon him. Finally the presence of his mother-in-law is tried, and this brings about the desired result. The other day a great theatrical manager ordered that no reference to mother-in-law should be made in his theaters. Mother-in-law is occasionally a very nice person. In this film she is the reverse, for it is only by her presence that a bad attack of hiccoughs is cured. This, like the film previously mentioned, is a ludicrously comic subject which provokes hearty laughter. On the whole a welcome relief to the more serious pictures which have recently come from the Gaumont Company.

THE CARDINAL'S CONSPIRACY (Biograph). ..

This picture is of the costume kind. In other words, one, when looking at it, has the impression that the author has gone to the pages of Stanley Weyman, Henry Harland or Morris Hewlett for his inspiration. We breathe the atmosphere of court life and are taken back, as it were, into a far more romantic period than the present. Briefly the story is that of the disinclination of a beautiful Princess to marry to order. A Cardinal, attendant at the court, conceives a plot, whereby the girl is made to fall in love with the unwelcome Prince. The latter hires a band of desperadoes and he rescues the Princess and her lady friends from the clutches of these terrible looking, but in reality quite harmless, villains. This is a step towards gaining the girl's heart, but the Cardinal, and the King, her father, put her to a series of further tests with the disguised Prince as the object. At the appearance of love in the Princess' bosom, they interpose all sorts of obstacles between her meeting the lover. A knowledge of female human nature will tell the reader that the success of this plot is assured, for the more numerous the attempts are to part them, the greater becomes the girl's ardour and finally she falls very much in love, indeed, with the Prince, who is given her hand, whilst the Cardinal and the King, in a little interesting aside, take snuff and exchange knowing winks. We have read this story, but cannot locate it, nor is it important that we should do so. The point we desire to note is the excellent clearness with which the Biograph Company have worked out a simple love theme on a canvas crowded with couriers, gallants, bravos and the usual attendants of a kingly court. The acting throughout is stately and dignified, and so far as we can judge convincing. The famous Biograph heroine plays her part exceedingly well, so do the Cardinal and the King, who look their parts to the life. The lover is perhaps less youthful than he might have been. We regretted as we saw the film that it was in cold monochrome, because such a subject as this, with its varied costumes, scenery and handsome appointments would have made a lovely thing to look on if it were colored. The picture is well worth seeing on account of the clever way in which a very difficult theme is handled by the Biograph staff.

WOOD FLOATING IN MORVAN (Pathe).

This is another of the industrial subjects which we are always pleased to commend in the pages of the World. In a series of well photographed scenes, that are nicely toned or tinted in the Pathe way, we witness the progress of the wood cutting and wood floating industry in continental Europe. The trees first of all are chopped down in the accepted fashion, and then the logs of wood pass through the various stages of transport, much as they do in the regions of the Canadian lumber trade. They are, as it were, shipped by river, and make their way to their destination by a series of interesting stages. In these stages there are some wonderfully good effects of rapidly moving water, which being properly tinted, make the picture, even on this account, well worth looking at, aside from its popular industrial interest. We noticed that the audience, when this picture was shown, followed it very attentively, which is one more proof that your modern educated moving picture audience appreciates the industrial applications of the moving picture camera, as well as its dramatic.

DRIVEN FROM HOME (Lubin).

This is an old title, and it tells by no means a new story; in fact, there is a certain artlessness about the latter to which we think the moving picture audience to-day is somewhat superior. Although it is fair to say that a subject of this simple nature commands great interest; especially amongst the smaller patrons of the silent stage. A pretty girl gives her hand to the wrong man, and she and her young husband have a very bad time, indeed, through the machinations of the defeated suitor, who, in the long run, is found to be Jim the forger. Before, however, the illustrious Jim is run to earth and duly brought before stern justice by a brawny policeman, he works a lot of mischief. He gets the hero turned out of his job two or three times, he makes love to the hero's wife unsuccessfully and misleads the girl's father all on account of these terrible forgeries, the exact nature of which Mr. Lubin's producer does not reveal to the audience. But then it does not do to be too critical of stage law or stage crime. Sufficient for the purpose is it to show that in this piece there was the bold, bad villain with the conventional sneer, that there were the virtuous hero and heroine, the deceived parent, and that all ends happily. And this is the story of "Driven from Home." Artless and ingenious, as we have endeavored to convince the reader, but no doubt very popular with a large number of the smaller patrons of the moving picture theaters, and in this respect, the Lubin Company is, therefore, perhaps wise in putting out subjects of such a nature. The film is photographically good, but we wish that Mr. Lubin's staff would remove or rather prevent the little surface defects in the way of marks and splashes which occasionally disfigure his otherwise excellent pictures.

"THE SECRET OF THE LOCKET" (Edison).

A striking drama which has been rendered into a film play in a manner highly creditable to the actors and the mechanical department. Few flaws are noticeable in either, and those who see the play say it is one of the best dramas the Edison people have ever turned out. When the mother pawns her child, and afterward dies from the effects of privation, the sympathy of the audience is aroused and it never wavers all through the succeeding scenes, and when at last the girl is returned to her father there is a murmur of satisfaction. The dramatic possibilities of this drama are more thoroughly developed than is usual, and the effect is to maintain the interest to the end. The Edison people have been producing some excellent dramas recently, and their reputation will not suffer in this instance. With the exception of here and there a short section, the photographic quality of the film is beyond criticism, and in the development of the story the details have been carefully considered. As a whole, the picture is a step higher.

"Mine at Last."—A love story from the Vitagraph studio which has some elements of novelty in introducing war scenes as a part of the play and showing one lover in a position to intercept letters between the other two. There is much good acting in the closing scenes when the villain is denounced in public. No one mourns particularly when death takes him. His villainy is of the type which has no sympathizers. The film is good photographically in most places, though a little weakness shows here and there, and the company act their parts with fidelity to the narrative.

"The Cobbler and the Caliph."—A Vitagraph film which contains a moral teaching, or, at least, a suggestion to be contented with one's lot. The cobbler who was transformed to caliph soon wearied with the manifold troubles and wishes himself a cobbler again. When the transformation is effected he is contented ever afterward. A well-conceived and well-staged picture that pleased the audience.

"A Sqeedunk Sherlock Holmes."—The Edison people have given a good burlesque of the average detective story in this film which has the photographic quality of their recent work. It is unquestionably as good a comedy as they have turned out in a long time, and the audience shows its appreciation in its hearty laughter. The acting is quite in keeping with the subject and is as smooth and even as the Edison actors usually are. As a welcome break from the far too frequent monotony of gloom and death this film is a decided success. It deserves a long run.

"An Absent Minded Cupid."—A comedy from the Edison studio in which the affections of a young man lead him into trouble, but an absent minded Cupid gets him out and he is able to wed the object of his adoration. The film is good photographically and the acting is excellent. The picture is quite as comical as the usual run of comedies from the Edison works.

"A Soldier of the United States Army."—A Kalem film which will be interesting anywhere in the United States since it tells in graphic fashion the story of the United States soldier from his enlistment up through his numerous experiences, including a battle in the Philippines, a waiting mother and a lonely grave. These pictures are interesting and valuable for two reasons. They show the real life of the soldier, which always possesses more or less of a glamor, and they teach the lesson that patriotism is costly in both blood and treasure. It might be a good thing for the entire country if this film could be exhibited everywhere. It should not exert any influence upon reducing the size of the army, but it would show plainly enough what the recruit is expected to do and what his life will be while in the service. For these reasons it deserves a long run and should be widely circulated.

"The Little Detective."—A story from the Pathes which has more of actual heart interest than detective stories usually have, since it introduces a child who discovers the man who robbed the safe in her father's office for which he was falsely accused, secures the police and has him arrested and her father released. It is told with the excellent photography of the Pathe films and with the innocent truthfulness which is inseparable from the work of children in this particular. The picture is sure to please because it is full of what appears to be real life.

"The Fan."—A trick film from the Pathes which introduces numerous interesting transformations and classic poses by beautiful girls on a fan. Some of the tableaux are especially good and will be certain to please any audience which has the good fortune to see them.

"Visions of Mother."—A Gaumont which might be used as a warning for those self-sufficient young men who neglect their mothers and spend their time among the riotous scenes of which their mothers often know nothing. In this picture the young man sees a vision of the mother whom he left in the night that causes him to resolve to return to her. But he finds that it is too late. She has died of a broken heart long before he came back. The acting is good and the last scene is sufficiently touching to make a deep impression. The photography is clear and the tones of the picture are good and accurate.

"A Bad Case."—A graphic illustration of different kinds of dangerous microbes with which individuals are afflicted. This gentleman was particularly unfortunate and had a serious case indeed. Those who see this film will recognize many of the troublesome microbes and will undoubtedly laugh heartily at the man's discomfiture when he discovers the nature of his disease.

"Wearybones Seeks a Rest and Gets It."—A Vitagraph film which illustrates in humorous fashion the desire of Wearybones to rest and how it was gratified. The action is good and the picture keeps the audience in good humor throughout its length.

THE ENTERPRISE OPTICAL MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

A NOTABLE MANUFACTURING SUCCESS.

While it may seem strange that the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, now located at 83 West Randolph street, Chicago, has never been the subject of more than one short article in any of the periodicals, the company is really one of the pioneers, and is one of the largest manufacturer in the line.

A few days ago the writer called on the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company in their new quarters, and in an interview with Mr. Roebuck, the president and owner of the company, he learned many things that he believes will be of general interest to the readers of The Moving Picture World.

The Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company was started in the Spring of 1898 as a co-partnership, for the manufacture of motion picture machines, magic lanterns, stereopticons, lantern slides and other optical projecting instruments, apparatus and supplies. At that time the exhibition of motion pictures as a business had only reached the point where it could be called a real commercial success, but even at that early date the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company had an excellent machine, which was not only well designed, but carefully made, and the business grew rapidly from the start. In those days the business of projecting motion pictures, with the exception of a few vaudeville circuits, was carried on almost exclusively by traveling exhibitors, who usually showed one night in a place, and such a thing as a continuous permanently located motion picture theater, or store show, was unheard of. In January, 1900, the company was incorporated, and the capital increased to keep pace with the growth of the business. The business of this company is unique, and it is the only concern of the kind in this line in the world, so far as we know, in that they manufacture and sell only to dealers, with the exception of repair parts, in cases where they feel that to furnish them direct will be an accommodation to the purchaser. The Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company issue very large and complete catalogues, which they supply to dealers that make a specialty of their line of goods.

The machines and other goods of the company's make have been improved from time to time to keep pace with the developments of the business. From the beginning they have made a specialty of supplying complete outfits to the traveling exhibitors, and Mr. Roebuck states that in his belief they have supplied more of these machines and outfits than any other maker.

About four years ago the first nickel theater was started. It immediately opened a new field. The requirements for this class of work were different from those of the traveling exhibitor. The traveling exhibitor used, as a rule, both slides and films to illustrate a lecture, and as his shows were usually one night stands, he used a light portable outfit, and the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company's outfits were especially designed for just such work. The nickel theater work, however, is different. It is usually an afternoon and evening steady grind, and the only intermission for the machine is when they show the illustrated song slides. To meet these conditions, the "Motiograph" motion picture machine was designed. It was then, and is still, the heaviest machine on the market, and being not only rigid, but extra well made, the pictures, when a good film is used, are rock steady, beautifully brilliant, and free from flicker.

These days since competition has so greatly increased, it is very difficult to get a new machine introduced. The dealers are too busy with film rental to devote their time to the introduction of a new machine, and the user is inclined to take no chances but to purchase a machine of known merit, but the Motiograph was of such excellent quality, and its features of merit were so conspicuous that it made a hit from the start. It is beautiful in design, and quite a departure from the general appearance of other machines. It possesses new improvements, such as the one and one-half minute rewind from the main crank handle, the revolving magazines, a special automatic fireproof shutter, a flicker eliminating feature, and a very heavy pedestal and base, besides many other special features not found in other machines. Any one accustomed to the use of light machinery could tell at a glance that it is unusually well made. The result was that almost from the beginning the factory, even though already enlarged, was unable to keep up with their orders.

After having paid bonuses to several tenants of the building where they were located to move to other quarters, they were finally forced to seek more commodious quarters, which were found in their present location at the northeast corner of Randolph and Jefferson streets, in what is known as the Rupprecht Building, which is a new, modern, strictly fireproof, reinforced concrete and brick construction. The only wood used is in the doors, windows and floors. The building is 100 feet square, and the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company occupies three floors. The third floor is mostly devoted to the office, shipping room, stock room and lantern slide manufacturing department. Incidentally Mr. Roebuck explains that his company has made all of the lantern slides used by Mr. Burton Holmes, who is noted for his world famous "Travelogues." In one year alone they made over 800 slides for Mr. Holmes.

The fourth floor, and part of the third floor, is devoted to manufacturing, including the nickel plating department. The second floor is devoted to manufacturing and assembling.

For arrangement of machinery, light, air and neatness this establishment certainly is a model, and reflects great credit on the management. The machinery used is of unusual high grade, and is nearly all new, the old machinery having during the past few years been sold or traded in for new, and instead of being installed hit and miss, is arranged according to classification. There are long straight rows of milling machines, of engine lathes, or bench lathes, of drill presses, of screw machines, each row all of the same classification, reaching clear across the big manufacturing room. Besides, there are many costly screw machines that make complicated and beautifully finished turned and threaded parts, and require little attention from an operator, except to occasionally supply a long rod of material and to measure the parts from time to time with a micrometer gauge that is graduated to thousandths of an inch. Then there are automatic gear cutters, for spiral gears, straight spur gears and bevel gears. There are universal and automatic grinders. The automatic grinder is really a marvelous machine, and while it is intended for the grinding of nohing but small parts, its weight is about 3,000 pounds. It is arranged to be set so as to automatically grind back and forth and stop at the fraction of a thousandth of an inch. Mr. Roebuck says, "it is customary to grind only a few of the smaller parts, but in our establishment we grind all the parts that are adapted to being ground."

Screw machines, engine lathes, bench lathes and grinders.

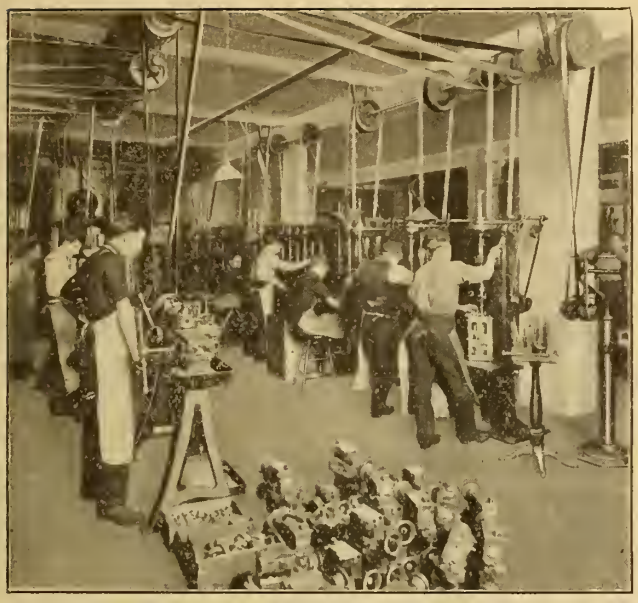
We were shown the pattern shop, where the company make their own patterns, and a complete nickel and copper plating plant, which is equipped with direct connected electric buffers, provided with exhaust fans for carrying off the dust, acid fumes, etc., and every modern convenience for the promotion of speed, quality, health and comfort.

We were next taken to the material department, where there are long rows of bins that stand seven or eight feet high, and hold thousands of castings, and other pieces of material. Mr. Roebuck explained that "different from most manufacturing establishments in this line who have their parts made in many factories, besides their own, to save investment in machinery, we make all but the castings and even make part of those. By making all of our own parts," he says, "we are able to work closer than is practicable where they are made in several factories, and that close work is absolutely necessary for fine work on the screen." At the far end of the material department, is the entrance to the fireproof vault, and when we entered that we were astonished at the size of it. We were told that it measures inside about 17 x 23 feet. There is shelving all around the wall and long rows of cabinets running from one end to the other, with just enough room for a man to pass comfortably. These cabinets contain thousands of drawers in each of which is stored from one to several kinds of parts of motion picture machines, gas machines, magic lanterns, stereopticons, calcium jets, arc lamps, rheostats, lens mounts, lens cells, etc. The parts are all finished and nickel plated, ready for assembling, and some of the small parts are partly assembled.



There are long, straight rows of machines.

The drawers all have labels, on each of which is marked the number of the part, or parts, the quantities that are put in, and the respective quantities that are taken out from time to time for assembling. At a glance, even though the number of parts in a drawer may run into the hundreds, it can be seen just how many parts are in stock.

On the end and side shelving, from the floor to near the ceiling, is the special tools, dies, gigs, etc., with which the different articles manufactured are machined, drilled, etc., so as to make them uniform and interchangeable, and to bring the cost down to a practical figure. To demonstrate the usefulness of these special tools, Mr. Roebuck explained that the machine work alone on the first model of the "Motiograph" mechanism cost them, without make over, more than $500, yet to-day they sell a complete No. 1 Mechanism for $125. The above cost did not include the cost of designing, and the patterns, core boxes, etc.

It was explained that these special tools, dies, gigs, etc., had cost about $35,000, yet they were of no value whatever for any other purpose than the finishing of the particular parts for which they were made.

It was also explained that the drawers and shelving in the vault contained about $40,000 worth of finished parts, and that the vault we saw on the third floor carried about $50,000 worth of condensers, calcium jets, rheostats, arc lamps, negatives for making lantern slides, and a considerable stock of lantern slides and other finished goods. Besides these goods was a very large stock of finished Motiographs in the No. 1, No. 2 and Stereo "Motiograph" grades. Mr. Roebuck assured me that the figures given were not subject to the discount customary in newspaper articles.

Next we went to the assembling room on the second floor, where we were astonished to find long rows of finished motion picture machines, gas outfits and other goods in all stages of completion, which gave us an idea of the enormous investment required to conduct a business of this kind. The work in the assembling room is handled very systematically; each workman assembles only certain parts. In this manner they are able to work more accurately and become experts in their particular line. After the parts are all assembled, the finished machines go to an inspector. The assemblers and inspectors sign their names to the assembling tag, and when the tag has the O. K. of the head inspector it comes to the wholesale department, where it is taken to a 65-foot demonstrating room, where it is given a thorough test by passing through it a 1,000-foot length of film, and projecting the film on the screen. If it works perfectly in every respect, it is placed in stock room for shipment.

After having come so closely in touch with all the different features of this model manufacturing establishment and noted the thoroughness in all the details, we can better understand why the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company has made such a prominent success, and why the "Motiograph" motion picture machine has so admirably endured the heavy and exacting requirements and is in such great demand.

The Assembling Room.

We would now like to say something about Mr. Roebuck, the able and genial manager of this establishment, but as space is limited, we will postpone that until another number.

Each row, all of the same class, reach clear across the big manufacturing room.

THE UNITED ECONOMIZER.

In a recent interview with Mr. F. L. Ferguson, sales manager of the United Manufacturing Company, he states that the company has had great success with their new economizers owing to the fact of the bright and steady light which they produce as well as the saving percentage of 60 per cent. The Hillside Park, one of the largest parks on the Jersey coast, has recently installed one of the United Economizers which has more than made good. Mr. Ferguson appeared to be very busy at the time of the interview, working on a device to be used as a current saver for direct current. Devices of this kind are at the present time limited. He promises big results. From their advertisements in this number it will be seen that they are offering a special inducement on their economizers for a short time only.

AN IDEAL SOUVENIR OR ADVERTISEMENT FOR MOVING PICTURE SHOWS.

From the Winthrop Moving Picture Company, 421 Lafayette street, New York, we have received several of those little thumb books which give an excellent moving picture effect. One, in particular, of Christy Mathewson, of the National Baseball League, delivering one of his famous curves, is very good indeed. These little books should be an excellent advertisement for a show, either to be given away or sold, with the advertisement of the show on the cover. Particulars as to prices in quantity and samples may be obtained from the Winthrop Company at the above address.

WIDE EXITS, EASILY OPENED, MEN TO HANDLE THEM, AND A COOL MUSICIAN SAVE TROUBLE.

The best of facilities for quickly emptying its big auditorium of its audience, and thorough coaching of employes as to what should be done in an emergency, prevented a panic last Monday evening at the Exhibit, a well-conducted moving picture show in Columbus, Ohio.

During a performance there was an explosion and in a second the room was in darkness. The audience rose from its seats, and the only thing needed was a cry of fire to cause a catastrophe. But in the crisis the piano player continued the music, the employes jumped to the large side doors, which are always kept fastened with easily removed hooks; pulled up the hooks and gave the doors a push open with one movement, and the proprietor, Max Stern, requested the audience to move out quietly, saying the performance would be resumed as soon as the trouble was located.

It was found that a small tube in a vulcanizing furnace in an adjoining bicycle repair shop had blown out, destroying the electric light fuses leading to the Exhibit. The damage was repaired in a few minutes.

AN APPRECIATIVE EXHIBITOR.

A World representative who dropped into the Omaha office of the Pittsburg Light and Film Company, was shown a letter which is so different from that generally received by exchanges from their customers that permission was asked for its publication:

Fremont, Neb., July 7, 1909.

Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Co., Omaha, Neb. Mr. Ramsdell:

Dear Old Friend—I am shipping you your film by express, charges paid. It was O. K. in every way and is the right dope for the box-office receipts. No more Independent subjects for me.

You know what Laemmle's ad. said in the "Show World" about the white elephant in your house? I am going to have one of those little white elephants in my house, and I am going to feed him $2.00 per week, because this little white elephant gets the people in the house, and they come back to see him each night, where the Laemmle Independent, Sweet Land of Liberty, was running them away till we had to sell peanuts on the side to help make expenses.

Now, Mr. Ramsdell, I have always been an Independent man, as you know, but the wisest of us make mistakes, and I want to say right here that I have made a big one by staying as long as I have by the Independent stuff like I have been running—and I have been running first and third run film—and it is killing the show business.

Well, I am fixing up a vaudeville stunt and can't possibly get away till Sunday. I have my service paid up till then with the ——— Co. Meet me at your office Sunday at ten or eleven o'clock and I will try to make a deal with you.

If you want your money for the film you shipped me, before Sunday, send in your bill and I will remit at once.

Many thanks to you, old man, for your help in time of need. I remain, Yours very truly, J. W. GLENN.

NOTES FROM CHICAGO.

Chicago, Ill.—Frank Gazzolo will erect a moving picture ttheater at 1003 West Madison street.

The Selig auto. race films have been a tremendous drawing card at the Orpheum Theater. It is safe to say that tens of thousands of people have witnessed the races via motion pictures.

Many of the smaller Chicago motion picture theaters have closed for the hot season. Some place the number at two hundred.

Another beautifully fitted 400-seat house is soon to open on Kedzie, near Harrison street. It will be under the able management of Mr. Horace Francis, who has guided the destinies of several of our successful houses in the past. Under Mr. Francis' management we predict a glittering success to the new house.

About August 1st the Selig Company will put out an entirely new model of their Polyscope. Many improvements over the older models will be in evidence, and the company claims the new machine will approach perfection as nearly as any projection apparatus on the market.

There have been dark r-u-m-o-r-s that there was g-r-a-f-t in connection with the examination and licensing of Chicago's operators. The man who would even suggest that there could possibly be graft in anything even remotely connected with the Epworth Band of Hope which runs the Chicago City Hall must have a nerve made of chilled bessemer steel. The very idea!

Anyhow, the Operators' Union wants all men re-examined, but whether or no it will be pulled off, the writer is unable to say. This much he does know, however: For each license issued the aforesaid "Band of Hope" received ten simoleons. If operators were re-examined and some rejected, the said "Band of Hope" (otherwise our esteemed City Government, otherwise our Business Administration) would have to give up the ten for each one thrown out. Umph! Mebby so, mebby so! but the writer's observation is that it requires a pretty stout crowbar to pry coin loose once it is in the hands of the Philistines. From some samples of "operators" the writer has seen sporting city licenses it would seem that a re-examination might possibly be very much in order, but—but (see above for answer to the "but").

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE RENUNCIATION: A Comedy Drama of the Wild, Woolly West.—There is certainly a positive axiom in the lines "Woman has more strength in her looks than we have in our laws," for we may say that the greatest heroes of history were made through woman's glances. The focused rays from woman's eyes have ever enkindled the flame of man's ambition and brought it to a state of ebullition. Hence it is but consistent that the appearance of pretty little Kittie Ryan at Yellow Hill Mining Camp should play such havoc. Joe Fielding and Sam Walters were boyhood chums, and becoming obsessed with the gold fever came out to Yellow Hill as partners. Both sturdy, honorable chaps, they found congeniality in each other's company. They worked together, shared the fruits of their toil, and, in fact, seemed a monumental typification of true friendship. We see them sitting on the rocks smoking and talking over old times, no doubt repeating the lines of Byron: "Ah! happy years! once more, who would not be a boy." But, lo! A cloud. The heart-high disturber appears in the person of Kittie, the pretty niece of old Steve Ryan, on a visit from the East. Joe and Sam are immediately smitten with the little one, whose lustrous orbs pierce their very soul. Both make up their minds to win her, as does every other fellow in the camp. However, Joe seems to hold high cards, and so the erstwhile chums are now bitter rivals. They quarrel over the precious bit of femininity, and a challenge to a duel with pistols is the outcome. Joe is a dead shot, while Sam's aim is uncertain. Upon returning to his cabin, Joe's eye alights on a photograph of the boyhood chums, and his heart softens. He realizes the duel can only result in the death of his chum, so he decides it shall not take place, and he writes a note, renouncing claim to the girl's attentions, and will leave the place at sunrise; in conclusion, hoping that Sam and Kittie will be happy. Relieved and happy at his self-sacrifice, he lies on his cot and sleeps. Meanwhile Sam is in his cabin in a state of nervous perturbation, knowing well that it would be fatal to face Joe's unerring gun, hence he plans assassination with a knife. Kittie learns his intention and follows him to Joe's cabin. Here a fierce conflict with bowie knives ensues, Joe having been taunted by Sam into participation. At a most crucial moment, Kittie rushes in and parts them, thereby intercepting a calamity. When she finds she is the cause of their conflict, she pretends amazement, and introduces to their notice as her favored Strephon the most effeminate, namby-pamby dude one has ever gazed upon. The contrast between the big, rugged miners and the weak apology for a human being is indeed superlative. One look is enough, and the chums in unison exclaim: "Well, I'll be ———," but there were ladies present.

SWEET AND TWENTY.—A pretty little comedy of love's young dream, presented in the most dainty manner imaginable. 'Tis late Spring, the flowers are in bloom and the birds are in tune to the lover's song, when Alice and Frank romp among the wildflowers. Frank is desperately in love with pretty little Alice, but she, while loving him in return, is a tantalizing mite of femininity and enjoys the sensation of keeping him guessing. However, as faint heart ne'er won fair lady, he persists so stubbornly that he finally wins her response. Frank is now in the very zenith of ecstatic bliss. They part at the door and Alice goes inside. Frank is too happy to lose her company so soon, so follows after. Entering the drawing-room, he espies what appears to be the object of his visit standing at the window closing the shades. Approaching stealthily, he kisses the braids of her hair and then turning her head around imprints a kiss on the lips of—"Great Scott! her sister." Here is trouble, for Alice had entered just in time to see the performance. It is all off between them, despite his explanation, and in desperation he resolves to go and throw himself into the lake and end it all. At the lakeside his determination receives a chill, and he is cogitating when he hears Alice approaching in pursuit to dissuade him from his dire design. He now makes the bluff at self-destruction, which goes; Alice doing her utmost to drag him from the spot. As his resistance is but mild, she succeeds, and they are once more folded in each others' arms, she accusing herself of being unreasonable and hasty, while he is proudly slapping himself on the back with the assumption that he is simply irresistible. They are just a couple of kids who will kiss and make up, only to quarrel again soon for the fun of making up.

JEALOUSY AND THE MAN.—"With groundless fear he thus his soul deceives, What frenzy dictates jealousy believes." These lines by Gay most aptly fit the principal of this Biograph story. Jim Brooks, a painter, and his wife, have boarding with them their best friend, John West. Jim and John being lifelong chums, Jim is amazed at what he imagines to be blatant perfidy in his wife and friend. He espies them whispering together on several occasions, but the apparently convincing evidence is the slipping of a note into the hand of John by the wife, while she visits their place of work, with their luncheon. This decides Jim, and he rushes home, arms himself with a gun, declaring they shall both die. You may imagine his surprise when, as he is about to assassinate the pair, they load him with presents, it being his birthday, which he had forgotten. Their little intrigues were in making the arrangement, and the note was a list of things for John to get.

EDISON MANUFACTURING CO.

THE MISSIONARY AND THE MAID.—It was the love of a dusky damsel that drove Henry Herbert from the African missionary field. He could stand for the hot pots and the cannibalistic soup tureens of those who were living in darkness and the dinge of their own color, but when it came to receiving an osculatory imprint from those merry widow lips of sofa cushion dimensions and an embrace from the huge arms attached to her 400-pound form, that was too much. He could serve the heathen even though he was tortured, but not when he was the object of such pachydermal passion. The innermost core of the hottest hot pot was infinitely preferable to the lady's love.

Henry wasn't much of the missionary order at that. He had been induced somewhat against his wishes to take up the studies for the field, but had his doubts about his fitness even when active preparations for his departure for Africa were already going forward. He had been a little of a sport in his time, and his friend, Pug Peity, thought he would waste his life in Africa.

To Africa Henry went, however, and the chieftain's fat daughter loved him from the moment of his landing. Umpilika she was called, and Umpilika vowed to have him for her very own. Heroically she saved him from the community pot to the cook's wrath. She forced the wedding bells upon him and then a diversion happened. A dusky, husky warrior returned from battle to claim the fickle one and Henry Herbert was compelled to do combat with him for her hand. Better this death than the marriage. Henry was happy, so happy he lighted a pipe and at the first puff of smoke from his pipe the cannibals scattered. Here was a devil indeed, a man who smoked as he talked. They never stopped running, all save the coy maid. She loved and she would be true—even to a white devil. She threw her arms around Henry in an excess of loving emotion and—he woke up.

It was all a dream, but it was enough for the intending missioner. He abandoned the cloth to the horror of his clerical friends and adjourned with the redoubtable Pug Pelty to the activity of the world. He couldn't face the prospect of possibly being loved by an elephantine maiden of cannibal lineage. App. length, 630 feet.

McGINTY'S SUDDEN RISE.—"Down went McGinty to the bottom of the sea" was one of the most popular songs of a comic nature ever published, and the reason for its pronounced success was due to the comedy of the situations suggested in its lines. There was a laugh in every one and this same statement may be made regarding the scenes in "McGinty's Sudden Rise," just about as good a laugh-producer as was ever staged before a motion picture camera.

McGiuty is the foreman of a rock blasting gang. Feeling the pangs of thirst he sends a youth for a bucket of potable refreshment, but, alas for his dreams of a cooling drink, the youth spills the contents of the pail. Having red hair, McGinty was not dilatory in administering physical punishment to the youth and the latter planned revenge. He had it by setting off a keg of powder on which the foreman sat to eat his noonday meal.

Up went McGinty toward the sunny, bright blue sky, and he didn't have a chance to know the reason of the why. Far upward he did sail, but he came down like a whale. Not that whales fall from the sky. Oh, no. But his crash was heavy enough for such a ponderous mammal. He hit a church steeple, likewise a few other objects, before he finally struck the cold, hard earth, and was minus an arm and a leg when his sorrowing workmen found him unconscious on the ground.

The workmen wheeled him to a surgeon, expecting little, but they got much. The doctor was of the occult variety. He made a few mysterious passes with his supple hands and arms, the missing members of the McGinty anatomy appeared and connected themselves and McGinty returned to his cheering men as sound as he ever was, as fiery of temper and as full of strenuous vituperation. App. length, 370 feet.

THE BRIDEGROOM'S DILEMMA.—A merry tale, forsooth, my gentlemen, and one that hath within it naught but bubbles of mirth, glittering in the sunshine of humor and sparkling with all the brilliant colors of imprisoned smiles. So an Elizabethan gentleman-courier might have proclaimed this film subject. It is indeed a thing of mirth and if merrier tales than the story it tells have been offered on the screen they have been jewels of comedy in all truth.

Witness Lord Quex placing the final touches upon his toilet preparatory to the wedding ceremony with Miss Gladys Vanderpool at high noon. He must have a cup of strong coffee to quiet his nerves. The old servitor brings the beverage and at that moment an unlucky accident causes the upsetting of the tray on a dresser drawer full of his lordship's shirts. The coffee stains fall on them all. Lord Quex has no others save some at a Chinese laundry, taken there several days previously by the old servant. It looks easy. Secure the shirts at the laundry. Certainly. But Lord Quex has mislaid his laundry ticket and the slant-eyed sons of Cathay will yield the laundry to neither his lordship's messenger nor himself. Madly Lord Quex dashes about to solves the problem. It is a holiday. The stores are all closed. He is going frantic. What can he do? A friendly tip from a passer-by. There is a little store open down the street. Thither the nobleman flies to find he must choose between a blue shirt or a dickey. He selects the latter and returns to his rooms.

Meanwhile the bridal party has had opportunity to learn what nerves are. The hour for the wedding arrives and is passed. The bride is near collapse. A scouting party finds Lord Quex, rushes him into his coat and off to the bride's home. At this juncture the fat Irish servant finds the laundry ticket, has no money to pay the bill, but takes the laundryman to the bride's home and here the celestial bursts in with his bundle upon the astounded party. The cord breaks as he demands his money and Lord Quex turns to find his shirts, collars and cuffs in a heap at his feet. length, 730 feet.

CASEY'S JUMPING TOOTHACHE.—Casey was a strong man, 'sure, for his size; he could lift more than any man at the quarry. He was a brave man, too, was Casey, and often vowed that nothing could get the best of him, but when that rousing, jumping nerve wrecking ache implanted itself in one of his teeth it floored him in the first round. He was crazy with pain, he gyrated, howled and nearly rent rocks in twain in his agony. At last the foreman took pity on him and helped the helpless stroug man to a dentist.

Casey's teeth had roots, well, those of an oak tree must have been pygmies compared with them. The dentist tugged and pulled, he used larger and larger forceps, while Casey bowled and yelled and vowed, when he had a chance to vow, that he was being murdered. Casey squirmed and pulled and kicked so that the dentist was finally reduced to his only alternative. Casey must take gas. Casey did. He inhaled with the depth and strength of an elephant. Unconsciousness stole upon him swiftly and Casey slumbered and dreamed.

The dentist began to make love to his pretty assistant, he forgot all about the patient and Casey filled so with gas that at last he floated upward, punched a hole in the ceiling, and drifted away, but just as he began to sweetly drift he came to with a yell. The dream was over and the tooth was out. App. length, 205 feet.

ESSANAY MFG. CO.

THE ROMANCE OF A STRANDED ACTRESS.—A romance that is tinctured with some pain of stern reality and filled with intense human heart interest from the opening to the close of the story, holding to view, also, a living principle of the "Good Samaritan" whose heart goes out to the stranger in distress.

It is a clean, wholesome lesson of sweet charity as against cold, heartless hypocrisy, with the final reward of virtue.

Our young heroine, Agnes Hiller, is the leading lady of a theatrical troupe which comes to the little town of Hampton in one of the New England States. They meet with misfortunes, bad business, lack of funds, etc. The manager skips and leaves the company stranded.

Agnes, just before the catastrophe, has sent her last dollar to her invalid mother; she has no means whatsoever. The landlord of the hotel has put her out and retained her baggage even to her small handbag.

Misfortunes crowd upon her and while she is crossing the street she is run down by an automobile. The people who crowd about her as she lies insensible upon the ground, refuse to aid her. She is an actress, and the strong prejudice against such bars her from their consideration. The young curate of the village is passing and seeing the uncharitableness of the people, appeals to two ladies of his congregation to care for her. They indignantly refuse to shelter "an actress." The young parson carries the girl to his mother, who receives her. She is nursed tenderly back to health.

The girl's patient forbearance and gratitude has won the affections of the mother and the heart of the young parson.

In the meantime gossips get busy. A committee waits upon the parson and demands that the actress be sent away at once and "end the village scandal."

The parson resigns his charge, begging the girl to marry him. Agnes, though she loves him, cannot bring further trouble on him, and she refuses him.

The young parson decides to make one last appeal to the committee and goes to the house of one of the ladies who demanded that the actress leave the parsonage. When he enters he finds the old ladies playing bridge. Weeping, they beg his forgiveness, declaring they will renounce cards forever, but he leaves denouncing them as hypocrites. Calling at the home of a deacon, who was also one of the committee, he finds this dignitary half intoxicated with the accusing decanter of whiskey at his elbow.

The young preacher returns to the parsonage, fully resolved to marry Agnes. They prepare to leave the village when the penitent and shamefaced committee call upon him, begging him not to leave, and offering no objections to his marriage to Agnes.

THE RENUNCIATION

COMEDY DRAMA OF THE WILD, WOOLLY WEST.

There is no accounting for a woman's whims or tastes. In this story, little Kittie Ryan visits her old uncle at the Yellow Hill Mining Camp, and throws all the miners into a frenzy. Every one of them falls desperately in love with her, especially Joe Fielding and Sam Walters, who have been chums since boyhood. Through their rivalry for her glances they become bitter foes, and a duel with pistols seems imminent. Joe, however, picks up a photograph of he and Sam as boyhood chums, and, being a dead shot, softens and feels he cannot kill his comrade, even for the sake of the girl, so decides to renounce his claim to Kittie's attention; but Sam enters threateningly and a bowie knife contest occurs, which would have resulted in a fatality had not Kittie entered and introduced her choice—the most effeminate, namby-pamby dude one has ever gazed upon. One look is enough, and the chums exclaim in disgust, "Well, I'll be ——," but there were ladies present.

LENGTH, 982 FEET.

RELEASED JULY 22, 1909.

The moon seems to get the worst of it and a comet appears, transforming into a beautiful woman, who remonstrates with him for the trouble caused. The moon enters a complaint against her antagonist and three stars sit as judges to hear the case. The legal battle is terminated in favor of the lover. Several years later conditions have changed and the commanding officer of the French party enters the home of the monk's mother and seeks refuge from a pursuing party. She at first refuses him aid and as he is about to go reconsiders, and presents him with the gown of her dead son, thus enabling him to make his escape. Her act is rewarded by the satisfaction due to the conviction that she has done just what her son would have done in returning good for evil. Length, 664 feet.

THE KING'S CONSPIRACY.—Captain Fretigny, an army officer during the reign of Louis XIII., receives a visit from the son of his friend, bearing a letter of introduction and commending him for service in the captain's regiment.

While the two are discussing the proposition, an order comes from the king, directing the captain to investigate a reported conspiracy under the auspices of one Concini.

The captain's daughter fears that harm might befall her father, but the young friend reassures her and even promises to follow and if necessary protect the parent.

Fretigny discovers the plot, but is recognized and obliged to fight for his life. He makes a brave stand, but is about to succumb to the superior number of his antagonists when his protector intervenes in his behalf. A terrible duel takes place, but, despite the great odds, the valiant young recruit is victorious, and taking the wounded captain in charge, brings him back to safety. When the king learns of the remarkable display of courage he sends his messenger and confers highest honors upon them.

The young man is enlisted in the captain's regiment and is also awarded the hand of the captain's charming daughter. Length, 957 feet.

THE TOMBOY.—Taken at Ladden Rock Farm, by courtesy of the owner, Wm. L. Marks, during the glorious month of June, a time when Mother Nature opens wide her lap and scatters her gifts about in careless abandonment, this picture offers a series of scenes that should hold attention by their beauty alone. But in addition is told the charming story of the Tomboy. At the time of the opening scene she is just budding into charming womanhood. Left motherless at an early age, her father, a lifelong invalid, in his desire to give her those pleasures denied him, has encouraged her live her life out in the open air. She has grown up on the beautiful estate more like a boy than a girl. Her favorite companion and playmate is young Ned, the son of a neighboring boyhood friend of her father's. It is the one desire of her father's heart to see young Ned and herself safely married before he dies. The only other member of the family is a ne'er-do-well nephew, to whom the Tomboy's father has given a home and education. This nephew, noting the growing feebleness of the invalid father, has been planning and scheming to marry the Tomboy in order to secure the fortune that will be her's ou her father's death.

The scene opens with a charming view near the house. The nephew, angered at the Tomboy for some slight she has given his advances, is venting his anger on one of her poor pets that happened to be in his way. Dobbins, the old gardener, who has raised this dog from a blind puppy, cannot bear to see such abuse aud remonstrates with the nephew. The nephew laughs sneeringly. Letting his righteous anger get the better of him, Dobbins strikes the nephew. The nephew cruelly feils him with a savage blow of his cane. Away the nephew goes, for fear someone may have seen him. Here come the Tomboy and her father to spend their customary morning hour by the lake. They discover old Dobbins lying senseless. Tenderly they lift him up. They question, but he refuses to tell how he was hurt. The father orders him taken to the house. Scarcely have the Tomboy and her father settled themselves when young Ned arrives. The father greets him warmly. Ned thinks this is a good opportunity to press his suit with the Tomboy. The old father encourages him. The nephew appears in the rear and overhears what they are saying. But the Tomboy is obstinate. She cannot see her childhood playmate Ned in the role of an accepted suitor for her hand. The father grows insistent. Finally the Tomboy stamps her foot and rushes off in a temper. The old father becomes greatly excited. Rising in his chair, he calls angrily after her. Now he lifts his fists. But the excitement is too much for his feeble frame. He gasps, strives frantically for breath, and falls lifeless into young Ned's outstretched arms. Young Ned lays him gently on the grass. The Tomboy, repenting of her foolish anger, returns to ask her father's forgiveness, only to find him lying lifeless at her feet. Overwhelmed with grief, she kneels over him, sobbing. Young Ned stands by, ready to comfort her in this her hour of trouble.

part of the grounds the adventuress is awaiting the nephew. Here he is at last. Hurriedly they talk over their plans. They have decided it will be necessary to be rid of young Ned forever. The stone bridge over the lake is the place. Young Ned cannot swim. If he should by any means fall into the water, who would know how it happened? But how to induce him to come there? A letter!

Scene VI.—The Plot Frustrated by the Tomboy's Heroism. Young Ned has received the note and is waiting for the adventuress at the bridge she indicated. He is idly reading her note and wondering why she wishes to see him. Here she is. She greets him and again thanks him for his kindness. Now she invites him to take a seat so they may talk it over. Back she glances to see that all is ready. A quick move and her handkerchief is floating on the water. Young Ned offers to recover it for her. Out over the water he reaches his fishing tackle. Up creeps the nephew. A quick push and the boy is floundering in the water. The two plotters hurry away. Meanwhile the Tomboy has gone for a horseback ride and is trying in the excitement of a wild gallop to forget what she had seen the other day. What was that? A cry? She listens intently. Again it is repeated. Down comes the whip across the flank of her horse and she is away at a breakneck pace. Back at the bridge the poor boy is fast losing his strength. No help is in sight. Ah! here comes the Tomboy. Down the hill she gallops. Courage, boy, she will soon be with you. Off the horse she throws herself. Into the water she leaps. Now she has the boy and is swimming ashore with him. Here comes the old gardener, who has arrived too late to prevent the plotters, but is in time to help the Tomboy. He calls for help and two other men come. They lift the boy and girl from the water. The boy soon recovers enough to tell his story and the men rush to catch the two guilty plotters before they escape from the estate. The boy and girl are left together.

A NUGGET OF GOLD.—The Quarrel. At the bar in a Western saloon stands Harry, a young miner, conversing with others, when Range, a rough-looking fellow, enters, slightly intoxicated. He asks the boys to have a drink. Harry refuses. This enrages Range. "You are going up to old man Hardy's to-night," he says, "to see his girl and you don't want her to smell the stuff on you. She will smell it alright," and he throws the contents of a wine glass over Harry's shirt. Harry quickly knocks him down.

Engaged. It is evening. Gertie at her home. When Harry enters he is made welcome by Gertie and her father. Harry proposes and is accepted.

Married a Year. A little baby brings sunshine to the happy home of Harry and Gertie. He kisses her good-bye and leaves, while the young wife fastens the door by putting the wooden bar across the door through iron hands.

A Rich Find. Harry finds a large nugget of gold. Wild with joy, he shouts loudly. Other miners come, among them Range. All look at the nugget and congratulate Harry, who rushes home to tell his wife of his good luck.

The Conspirators. Range is trying to get Harry out of the way. He hires two greasers, with whom he promises to share the claim if they will do what he wants. They readily consent.

The Spy. Harry is just showing his wife the big nugget of gold. They dance around with joy. Harry goes to the bed, pulls out a bag half full of gold-dust and nuggets, deposits the nugget just found with the others and replaces the bag in its hiding place. He has not seen the face of the greaser outside of the window who watched every one of his movements and rushes to Range and his accomplice, telling them of the secret hiding place of Harry's gold. Range tells the greaser to deliver the following note to Harry:

"Harry Boy—Come over to the ranch house at once. I want to see you on very important business. Hurry. "DAD."

Harry tells Gertie he must go at once. They embrace and kiss, and he leaves while Gertie is giving the greaser a drink of water. The greaser steals the door bar, which he brings to his waiting accomplice. Range goes towards the house, telling the greasers to watch for Harry. Gertie having looked vainly for the bar and seeing Range approach, puts her arm into the door rings. Range tries to open the door, but Gertie holds it fast. Range enters through the window and overpowers Gertie. He takes the bag of nuggets, then picks up the senseless form of Gertie and starts for the door. He is just putting Gertie on one of the three horses which the greasers bring when one points down the road. Somebody is coming. Range drops Gertie, the three mount their horses and quickly gallop away. Just then Harry, Hardy and cowboys ride up, find Gertie and carry her into the cabin. They revive her and she tells the story.

The Pursuit. The miners are quickly alarmed. Cowboys and miners start in pursuit. In the meantime Range and the two greasers divide the spoils. He wants to keep the large nugget for himself. A fight ensues. Range shoots one of the greasers in the arm, while the other one knocks the gun from his hand with a knife. Just then Harry and his party surround Range and the greasers. They are overpowered, a rope is tied around their necks and they are led away to the next tree.

All's Well That Ends Well. Gertie is seated in a chair, her bandaged arm in a sling. Harry, the cowboys and miners return. Harry embraces Gertie, shows her the bag of nuggets. There is general rejoicing. Length, 995 feet.

HIRING A GIRL.—Mrs. Newlywed goes to the employment office to hire a girl. There are more than fifty applicants for a position. As soon as Mrs. Newlywed makes her appearance she is besieged by the crowd. Frightened, she runs away, followed by the anxious women. She appeals to the police for protection, but the police are helpless against such a hurricane of femininity.

After many incidents and accidents, Bridget finds the exhausted Mrs. Newlywed and brings her home. There she reigns now as the queen of the kitchen. Length, 330 feet.

MEXICAN BILL.—Inez, Major Kingston's daughter, while riding to the ranch house, meets Mexican Bill as he is just chasing an Indian off the land. The poor fellow was at the river drinking water when Mexican Bill kicked him into the stream. Enraged, Inez takes her riding crop and beats Bill unmercifully. He turns towards her, but is soon given a dose of his own medicine by Yorel, Inez's lover. Mexican Bill swears revenge. He speedily rides to Major Kingston's house and tells him of the cowboy's love affair with Inez.

When Yorel appears with Inez, Major Kingston shows him the door, with instructions never to approach his girl again. Yorel puts his horse away and then returns to the old man to tell him of his love for Inez. At this moment Mexican Bill raises the window and fires a shot at the old man, who drops to the floor. Mexican Bill rides to the ranch house and gives the alarm, saying that Yorel killed Major Kingston. The Indian, who was a witness of the incident, tries to tell the truth, but is choked by Mexican Bill, gagged and bound and thrown down an embankment, where he is later found by Inez. She, together with the Indian, tell the truth about Mexican Bill's outrage. The boys free Yorel and chase after Mexican Bill, who, even though having a big lead, is captured after some swift riding. He is brought before the old man, who confirms Yorel's innocence. Mexican Bill is strung up, while Yorel gets the hand of his sweetheart. Length, 650 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

BEHIND THE MASK.—The opening scene shows the interior of a home where a man and his wife are at dinner, but on this particular occasion they are very much at swords' points with each other, and after a general "rough house" in which both equally participate, the man makes a bolt from the place. The wife is left alone to air her feelings, and picking up a paper she reads of a masked ball that is to be given that night at a fashionable hotel. Disgusted with everything, and determined to seek a diversion, she makes preparations to go to the ball. Hailing a cab, she enters it and soon is in the midst of the gay festivities. The husband, in the meantime, makes up his mind to attend the same ball, so, after going to a costumer where he fits himself out in a fancy suit, he, too, makes for the scene of splendor. Hardly has he arrived when he spies this prim little woman who is well disguised, and, after a short flirtation, the pair become very chummy. The man invites his charming partner to partake of some refreshments which she graciously accepts and the happy pair are in high glee mingling with the crowd of revelers, and never for a moment suspecting each other's identity. Finally they retire to a private dining-room to have a little supper, and when alone, they agree to remove their masks; so off they come, and there, facing each other, are man and wife. They each treat the episode as a great joke, and after talking matters over they decide to patch up their little misunderstanding and live happy in the future. Length, 393 feet.

THE FIDDLERS.—We are confronted in this clever trick picture by a happy group of colored minstrels, who take their respective places, and proceed to entertain us by their many funny antics. After strumming upon their musical instruments they strike some funny poses and envolve themselves into all sorts of grotesque and unique shapes which are highly amusing and well worth seeing. Length, 278 feet.

CATCHING TURTLES.—In this picture we see the natives of a tropical country engaged in catching monstrous turtles. In the first picture we see a boat load of men come to the trap and after a short search they are successful in capturing a big fellow, which they drag into the boat and take to the village. One thing worthy of special mention is the way a turtle is harnessed and made to drag a little wagon in which two children are seated. Length, 210 feet.

BEWITCHED MANOR HOUSE.—This picture reveals an old, deserted castle, which is infested with spooks. Two wanderers happen by as night falls, and having no place to lodge they pick out this very desirable looking old house as a place to rest and spend a quiet night. Upon entering the castle they soon discover that they are sadly disappointed in their choice, for immediately they see all sorts of strange objects dancing around them and grotesque spook faces gazing at them from every nook and corner. Too late to retrace their steps, the pair enter the old deserted dining-room, where, standing in the corner, is a closet copiously filled with rare edibles. As they are about to help themselves a lot of fierce looking animals come from the closet and proceed to make life unbearable for the distressed guests. The pair rush into the kitchen and there they meet his Satanic Majesty, who does some of his fine work and calls forth more ferocious beasts, and things are reaching a serious state in the place when, behold, the good Fairy Queen appears and changes everything into the sublime. The animals are all transformed into gallant knights and by a wave of the magic wand a group of pretty maidens appear and the old deserted castle is turned into a most hospitable place where the weary old travelers take advantage of all the courtesy showered upon them. Length, 360 feet.

LITTLE BUSYBODY.—An old scientist who is tired after a long and strenuous day of research falls asleep in his studio. Soon his little grandson sneaks in and being an inquisitive little busybody, the young rascal proceeds to investigate everything in the place, and through his peering into some things which are supposed to be secrets, we have an opportunity of enjoying a little peek also, for everything that he sees through the magnifying glass is transmitted for our benefit upon the screen. In the first place he goes up to the telescope and gets a good view of all the heavenly bodies, then turning the telescope earthward, he views a lot of very amusing incidents far out of his reach. Finally coming into the studio he takes a piece of cheese and through the aid of the magnifying glass he shows the cheese lovers the good qualities of the delicious stuff, as also does he magnify a drop of water and many other things of interest which if viewed at a proper time will be the cause of many swearing off for life. Length, 489 feet.

A CASE OF LUMBAGO.—This picture shows a fellow who is suffering from a bad case of lumbago, and the excruciating pains which shoot through his system at every move cause him to wince and turn into all sorts of grotesque shapes. He has a very important social engagement and must keep it at any cost, never daring to let such a little thing as lumbago deter him. After going through all sorts of misery in dressing, he finally gets out on the street, where he hails a cab, and when he tries to enter, he is not physically capable of such a task, so the cabby is pressed into service and lifts him bodily into the rig, where now he is unable to sit down. At one jolt of the cab he falls into the seat, and is compelled to remain there until, reaching his destination, the driver lifts him out and starts him on his merry way. Entering the reception room where all the guests are assembled, he tries his best to look pleasant and he is succeeding nobly until they ask him to have a seat. Not satisfied to sit down, he refuses, whereupon one of the other guests gives him a push and with a terrible shriek he falls into the chair, nearly causing a panic among the fair ones. Finally his lady friend gets him into a cozy corner, and when he refuses to be seated she upbraids him and after giving him a rather cutting "call down" she leaves him and joins another man of a more charming disposition. Length, 328 feet.

SWEET TOOTHED DOGS.—An old dog fancier leaves his home, leading his little terrier on a leash, and going to a confectionery store he purchases a bag of candy from which he gives his pet a few pieces. Just then an old street poodle comes along and the generous man throws him a piece of the sweets, whereupon the grateful beast tags on and there is no possible way of getting rid of him. As the man goes along the street it looks as though every dog in the town knew that he had a bag of their favorite candy, for a group of canines keep augmenting at every block until the man is swamped. He tries to escape them by jumping into a cab, but this has little effect, for the dogs keep up to the fleeing vehicle. Next he gets into a trolley car, in the hope of losing his trailers, but that is ineffective also, as the animals crowd into the car and drive all the other passengers to distraction. Finally after a long and weary chase, in which the unfortunate man, who has not alone all the dogs in the town, but the inhabitants as well, reaches his home, where he enters quickly and makes his way to his own apartment. The people follow him in and there is a general "rough house" before the police arrive and save the dog fancier's life. Length, 315 feet.

HOLDING UP THE WEDDING.—The happy wedding party start out for the office of the Justice of the Peace, where the knot is going to be tied, but as they are strolling along a fellow steps up to the prospective bridegroom and hands him an important paper which calls for his immediate attention. The latter excuses himself from his friends, telling them to go right along to the place set for the ceremony, and that he will follow soon. He then goes to a summer garden with the man, where, after attending to his business, he has a drink, after which he makes an attempt to leave and join his friends. As he gets to the gate he meets an old friend, and the pair return and have some more refreshments in honor of the wedding day. Every time that the fellow starts out of the place he is sure to run into some one whom he knows and each time he has a drink, forgetting all about the wedding party who are nearly frantic waiting for him to come. Finally he is hardly able to walk, so climbing into a cab, he is driven to the place to join his friends. In the meantime they have become tired waiting and all have fallen asleep.

WON IN THE DESERT.—Suakim, Arabia, on the Red Sea, is one day's camel ride from the Berbar Oasis, and two hours after leaving the straggling Arab town, with its strange mixture of African inhabitants, a rocky wall or pass confronts the tourist. Looking seaward, a fair land, green fields and well kept, primitive farms greet the eye. But let the traveler cross the rocky range of hills and he will find himself on a well-defined caravan trail in an otherwise pathless desert. If his convoy is numerically strong he need have no fear of the marauding hands of Berbar who infest the region. They are daring and crafty and unquestionably brave, and if the desert travel is light they do not hesitate to enter the town of Suakim to ply their trade of extortion. Our present picture story deals with a case of this nature.

H. Packington, a wealthy pork packer of Chicago, arrives at Suakim on a tour around the world, accompanied by his wife and daughter, who are agreeably surprised to meet at the hotel an old friend from the States, a Captain Henry Norris, of the U. S. S. Panther. His vessel is lying at anchor awaiting orders from the Government. Norris has with him one of his aides, a dashing young lieutenant by the name of Jack Danton. Introductions are in order and it is a case of love at first sight with Jack and Packington's pretty daughter, Mabel.

The party repair to the cafe to enjoy luncheon and a conversation about mutual friends back home. A few evenings later Jack and Mabel are enjoying a moonlight stroll in the beautiful gardens of the hotel and we see that they are under surveillance. Sheik Ahmet, who styles himself "King of the Desert," has learned from his spies about the hotel that the American is very rich and he has formulated a plan to secure a goodly share of his wealth. We see the unsuspecting couple bid each other goodnight on the vine-covered balcony overlooking the gardens that they have just left. Jack runs briskly down the steps and out into the street. As the girl turns to enter the hotel her head is suddenly covered with a large shawl, a rough hands placed over her mouth stifles an involuntary scream, and though she struggles bravely, her efforts are useless. A half-dozen brawny arms encircle her and she is lifted over the low balcony onto the back of a camel, and her captors steal silently into the darkness. The next day we see the brave girl alert and defiant in the hands of Ahmet's band crossing the desert waste, bound for the oasis of Berbar, where they intend to camp.

We leave the caravan in the desert and take a glimpse of the oasis before they arrive. As the scene changes a tawny lioness stands as if guarding the spring; her head raised listening, the sound of human voices reaches her ears. With a startled roar she leaps straight at us and is gone. Next we see the caravan arrive and the Sheik's party pitch their tents, post guards and prepare to await developments.

The Sheik writes to Packington demanding a ransom and a messenger mounts his horse and starts back to Suakim with the letter. We follow this messenger and see him deliver the demand.

"Mr. Packington:—Send ten thousand dollars to the Berbar Oasis. No treachery. The trail is watched. Sheik Ahmet,
"King of the Desert."

The astonished father turns to question the Arab messenger, but he has disappeared. Jack Danton enters half-crazed with grief and anxiety, and together the two go in search of Norris. The captain, after reading the demand, acts with American promptness, and determines to take a squad of sailors fully armed and equipped and rescue his countrywoman. With young Danton at their head we witness their departure. We see them on the trail, see them find the captive, and with her make a dash for freedom. A running fight between the Arabs and sailors occurs. At last they reach the rocky pass that divides the desert plains from the fertile valley of Suakim. The sailors, led by Danton, who has Mabel under his personal care, dismount and turn their horses loose and all make a dash for the footbridge at the head of the ravine. After all are across, the sailors work desperately to push the frail structure off the rocks. As it topples over, three hearty American cheers warn their pursuers that their prey has escaped. A relief party from the ship arrives and the now exhausted girl is soon restored to her mother's arms.

Two weeks later Jack's ship is ordered to sea and we see the sweethearts parting in the little garden where their romance began. That evening Mabel forms a resolution. "Papa, I want to marry Jack. You need a young partner at the stockyards. Let's wire him to resign and you offer him the job." The grateful father consents.

Our final scene occurs aboard the Panther. Jack is alone in his cabin, very dejected and unhappy at being separated from Mabel. A knock comes at the door. "A wireless for you, sir."

Via Wireless:

"Jack Danton, U. S. S. Panther.

"Hurrah! Pop says yes. Resign and meet me in Chicago. Mabel."

And so we leave the elated lover to happy thoughts of the future to be spent by the side of the girl his bravery won in the desert.

INSTRUCTION BY CORRESPONDENCE.— Bertram Brown, a weak-minded young man, is hard up. He reads in the newspaper an advertisement of "how to make a fortune quickly, taught by correspondence," and sends for the particulars. The first lesson tells him to earn the gratitude of a millionaire by saving his life. He picks out such an individual, a Mr. Moneybags, and tracks him all over town in the hope of saving his life. Moneybags becomes suspicious, tells the police, and Brown is arrested as an anarchist with homicidal intentions. Undeterred by failure, he takes the second lesson, which tells him to rescue an heiress. He watches in front of a wealthy girl's house, sees her, as he thinks, come out, rescues her in a crowded street from being run down, only to find, after his adventure, that it is the servant. The third lesson tells him to rescue a rich, old maid from a burning building, and if necessary to set the building on fire himself. He hides underneath the bed of a rich old lady, Miss Perkins, with this intention, but is discovered, arrested as a robber and, instead of finding a fortune, is left breaking stones in prison. Length, 510 feet.

THE ADVENTURES OF FIFINE.—The plot is laid in a French academy near Paris, where Fifine, an orphan scholar, is discovered in the classroom with other girls of her own age. Presently Fifine, who has apparently been working very earnestly, nudges one of her classmates and holds up to view a caricature of Madam Lemair, the teacher and head of the academy, which she has drawn upon her slate. There is a general snicker among the girls, whereupon Madam commands Fifine to bring the slate. Madam looks at the picture in horror, places a fool's cap on Fifine's head and stands her on a stool. Here the mischief-maker cuts up all manner of capers until the class is dismissed. She is kept and Madam shows her a letter from her guardian, in which he states that he has arranged to marry his ward to his nephew, Paul Leval, in a month's time. Fifine tears the letter in pieces and goes angrily from the room. Before retiring for the night Madam visits her dormitory, assures herself that the pupils are asleep, then goes to her room. The door is scarcely closed when Fifine sits and awakens her chums, to whom she tells of the arrangements for her marriage and of her determination to escape from the school. She dons a suit of boy's clothes and, with the aid of the girls, climbs out of the window and is gone. The next morning finds her trudging along the country road, tired and hungry. She has no money and an apple orchard near by appeals to her as the only place where her hunger can be appeased. She gathers a few apples and is contentedly munching them when a shout alarms her and an angry farmer and two servants are rapidly approaching. She runs off, closely followed by the farmer and his assistants and a gendarme whom they have pressed into service. Coming to an apartment house, Fifine dashes in the entrance, through the hall and up the fire-escape, through a window into an apartment, where a young man is smoking and yawning over his newspaper. He springs to his feet in astonishment at the sudden appearance of Fifine and asks the trouble. She tells of her experience in the orchard and begs him to protect her. At this moment there is a knock at the door. The young man hides Fifine under a table, resumes his reading as the door opens and the pursuers enter and demand the object of their search. The young man denies any knowledge of the culprit and orders them from his room. When they have gone Fifine emerges from her hiding place, partakes of some refreshments and she and the young man are talking pleasantly as another knock is heard. Fifine hides again as Mons. Leval enters excitedly and tells the young man that his ward has run away from school and the marriage he had planned must for the present be postponed. In the midst of the conversation Fifine comes from beneath the table and throws herself into Mons. Leval's arms. When the situation is explained and Fifine realizes that her protector is none other than Paul Leval, to escape marrying whom she ran away from school, she regrets her hastiness, runs to him and nestles in his arms, while her guardian stands by, astonished but pleased. Length, 490 feet.

Box Ball Doubles the Profits of Your Theatre

$800 a Month With No Expense But Rent!

Moving picture shows pay out big money every week for employes, song slides and film rental. But Box Ball is a business that often brings in $200 in six days, yet has absolutely no expense but rent. One customer with four alleys took in $1,845.20 in 59 days.

Customers who spend only five cents in the theatre spend more than a dollar at Box Ball. Crowds are quickly fascinated with this new game. They never tire—the more they play the more they want to keep on playing. No one wants to quit loser, so he plays game after game—often spending hours when he first intended to spend a few minutes.

When the crowds are in your theatre give them free tickets for the first game. Every one will play at least once and many will become regular customers. Women and children play as well as men—they form teams and clubs and often spend a whole afternoon or evening.

Install one of these money-making games in connection with your theatre. Rent the room above or get the store next door. Put in two or more alleys and you will be simply amazed at the wonderful profits.

Your only expense will be rent. Players set the pins with a lever and the balls are automatically returned. One man to collect the money is all you need, and he can care for as many as ten alleys.

One game usually lasts six minutes with two players. At 5 cents each that's $1.00 an hour from every alley—you can figure the profit yourself. With ten hours' play two alleys will bring you $20 a day, or $120 every six days.

Send for our free booklet and learn how you can own one of these great money-making games for only a few dollars down and the balance payable from your profits. Remember—you pay just a few dollars down, and your profits the very first month should more than pay the entire cost of the outfit. Write for booklet at once. Address

Old Wine in New Bottles.

There is a common tradition that all narrative stories trace their original sources either to Assyrian Papyri, the Pyramids, or a few tablets of antediluvian origin. Solomon, as we all know, said some 3,000 years ago that there was nothing new under the sun. If that was true then, it is certainly true to-day.

These reflections have occurred to us when looking at some of the stories that the film manufacturers have recently been adapting and putting out. We do not know how these stories came to be adapted, or who is responsible for their selection, but the fact remains that in several cases we might specify, long popular novels and plays have been taken up in substance and then converted into moving picture form and the films given new titles.

In very recent times we have been told on excellent authority that the day when people of the eminence of Clyde Fitch, Augustus Thomas and other noted dramatists would write stories for moving pictures was at hand. Evidently the time is ripe for the change. If the moving picture stage is ever to compete successfully with the talking stage, it must abandon the practice, once rife in theatrical circles, of hashing up and rehashing up old stories and plays that did duty in the days of our grandparents. In other words, the plays must be original in so far as originality can be got in the year of grace 1909.

Of course, as practical men, we recognize the difficulty of providing fresh, attractive, novel themes, but, after all, this is the difficulty which confronts every editor in the world. These unfortunate people earn their daily bread by exercising every vigilance in the search for new talent. So do the publishers. And that it is to be found is shown to the readers of the magazines and the publishing houses. A first rate magazine or a first rate publishing house which relied for success on resuscitated, fossilized classics of fiction under new titles would very soon find that the wrong course had been chosen; for the critics and the public would get wise to the game and circulations would suffer.

As we have over and over insisted, the moving picture public is a very critical public, just as critical as the magazine or book reading public, and we draw attention to this practice of putting old wine in new bottles as a very dangerous one. Old wine, it may be explained here, is not necessarily good because it is old; it may be sour, or too potent, or in some other way deleterious. For "wine," if you like, reader, read "beer" or any other commodity of human consumption. In other words and plainer terms: the public will not stand for buying and paying for as new that which is old and played out.

Magazine and publishing houses, besides employing editors and the like, also engage the services of "readers," i. e., men whose experience and knowledge enables them to tell at a glance whether a book or a story submitted to them is new and original or only a rehash of what has been published before. Something of the same kind of arrangement seems called for in moving picture houses. If the necessary knowledge were at hand, we are convinced that many stories that have recently been put on the moving picture stage would never have been issued. We are told often enough that large numbers of scenarios are offered and very few of them accepted. We wonder if the originals are rejected simply because there is a lack of ability to recognize what is original. We have also had complaints from those who are writing picture stories, that their best work has been turned down and that that which is accepted is "improved."

The object of this article is to draw the attention of film manufacturers to the urgent necessity of paying closer attention to the story end of matters. There is plenty of originality in the world, but all good things want some trouble in finding. If the producers who are employed by the various film houses would only take the necessary trouble, we are confident that they could get all the original work for their films that they are likely to require.

The Factor of Uniformity.

If order is Heaven's first law, then uniformity must be one of its important rules. We do not know what the first law of moving picture making is, or should be, except to make the best, but we are in no sort of doubt as to the value of uniformity in the work. Uniformity, of course, is only another way of saying that everything at the technical end of matters should be standardized, as was pointed out in a series of articles called "The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making," that finished publication a few weeks ago.

This question of uniformity has come into our minds several times lately when we have formed members of the paying public at some of the theaters for the purpose of writing our criticisms. And it arose with the greatest possible prominence only last week, when, in company with a friend, we were examining some of the latest films. The figures in this picture arrested our attention. Or we should say a part of the picture. These figures were so large that they occupied the entire perpendicular dimension of the sheet, that is, the figures that were nearest to the camera. The consequence was that the people in the theater had the idea that the film showed a story that was being enacted, or had been enacted, rather, by a race of giants or giantesses. A little later on in the course of the picture the figures had been photographed at a greater distance from the camera and so were less monstrous to the eye; while, in even a third part of the picture, the figures were so far away from the camera that they appeared of their natural size—an effect which was more agreeable to the audience.

Now, here was a total lack of uniformity, due entirely to a want of intelligence on the part of the producer and the photographer, and the effect on the minds of the people who saw this picture was extreme dissatisfaction. There is only one other explanation for this apparent discrepancy in size of the various parts of this picture, and that is that the lens varied in focal length. Of course, this is absurd to suppose. Only one lens was used in taking the various parts of this picture. Where the fault lay was in the disregard of uniformity of conditions evinced either by the photographer or by the producer, or both. If these figures had been photographed at equal distances from the camera, then they would have appeared of equal sizes on the screen, instead of varying between the dimensions of a Brobdignagian monstrosity and Lilliputian pigmies.

It is curious to reflect that in an hour's entertainment of a moving picture theater, the visitor sees an infinite variation in the apparent sizes of things as shown by the moving picture. This is absurd. On the vaudeville or talking stage, figures of human beings do not expand or contract irrationally or eccentrically; they remain the same size. Not so on the moving picture stage, where, as we have said, one film shows us giants and another mannikins. Now this is eminently a case, we think, where some sort of attempt should be made by somebody to make things uniform. It is not our business, of course. We do not make the pictures. If we did, however, we should make them not on the mammoth scale, but more in accordance with the need of conveying the correct sensuous impression.

AN ENGLISH VIEW OF THE AMERICAN MOVING PICTURE.

By Fred Marriott.

Being familiar with the moving picture in London, I thought that perhaps a few impressions of my visits to moving picture theaters in New York City might be of interest to your readers. Incidentally, I might remark that I am but a new arrival in New York City, that this is my first visit thereto.

The morning after my arrival, having nothing particular to do except to endeavor to satisfy my curiosity, I was passing through one of the small squares, gazing wildly around, when my attention was attracted by a somewhat ambiguous sign bearing the words "Bijou Dream." What that meant was Greek to me, but as there was a courteous attendant standing in a particularly inviting though small vestibule in front of resplendent glass paneled doors, my curiosity was aroused and I decided to elucidate the mystery of the "Bijou Dream."

Paying a very moderate entrance fee I was surprised to find a nicely appointed little theater, nicely carpeted, "where soft the footsteps fall," and seated on either side in rows towards the front a silent and orderly audience, mostly of men, gazing at moving pictures. Yet, it was barely past 11 o'clock and my surprise was great to see so many people assembled at that house, a thing that would not for one moment be contemplated by a Londoner, whose pleasures begin later.

There is a celebrated London music hall that tried the experiment of afternoon entertainments, i. e., between 2 and 5 o'clock, of a similar kind, but the audience I saw there were of a very meagre description, although another enterprise a little further away continues to attract considerable audiences, but these are composed, not of business men, but mostly of ladies and their children, who come from the West End of London to see this novelty. The idea of an all-day show has not caught on with us in England as it appears to have done in a very marked degree here, and in the States, and the absence of the ladies and their youthful offspring and the substitution of obvious men struck me very forcibly.

Taking a comfortable seat I was just in time to hear a young man of excellent voice render a song with a popular chorus, but your audience did not respond as an English one would have done to that catchy chorus.

The effect of his singing, however, was marred by his attitude, one that would not be tolerated by a London management, for he lounged on in an indolent manner, with his hands in his pockets, as if he were hovering over the almighty dollar, and wondering if he had enough to spare to take his sweetheart for a blow on the river on Sunday with etc., to follow, or as you would say over here "to have a good time." This spectacle was neither graceful on the singer's part nor respectful to the audience. But I digress. The songs, together with the accompaniment on the piano, as in London, were appropriate to the subjects on the screen and well rendered.

This particularly struck me at another theater that I subsequently visited (and of which more anon) when a mandolin accompaniment was introduced coinciding with the movement of the figures in the picture. Certainly your moving picture caterers here spare no pains to render effective the scenes they depict. Although the exhibition was very varied it struck me that the scenes were in many cases much too long; take, for instance, the representation of a ski-ing tournament. A little bit of this goes a long way. You don't want to see a man jump forty or fifty times over the same course or on different parts of the same course. It gets monotonous. The more so as the glaring white sheet of snow with its very dark masses of watching humanity in contract is absolutely devoid of interest.

Prolonged agony is surely not conducive to amusement and the American moving picture people might well follow the example of the London moving pictorialists and seek more to make people merry than to make them sad. A business man requires relaxation, perchance he has sickness at home. Why remind him of it? Seek to cheer him up with your subjects, not to make him sadder than ever by watching what I saw this week. Here is the story:

A well appointed doctor's house in the country. A charming young wife with a lovely child. They all go out together gathering flowers in the fields, depicted, by the way, in a most charming and delightful set of well posed and well lighted pictures. Then the clouds begin to gather, the man on my right opens a book and begins to read. I didn't weep but I was near it when the child fell ill, dying, revives, agony of mother, little better, relapse, doctor called away to another child patient, by agonized poor widow, painful hesitation of doctor, as to whether he shall save the widow's child possibly at the expense of his own. Goes to widow's cabin or whatever they call it where I imagine same child model goes again through various agonizing stages of illness. Doctor performs surgical operation and wipes up the blood, leaving patient much better only to find, on arriving home, that his own child is dying. More agony. Death of child. Still more agony of husband and wife. Curtain. And yet a man behind me, and he was the only one who spoke, said, "Very good." I call it infinitely pathetic. I admire your American sense of quaint humor, but this was beyond a joke, and the man with the book still read on. I will, however, say this for the scenes, they were only too well acted and too well reproduced.

Now let me take the opposite side of the theater. A charming set of colored pictures which indeed did not belie the indication of the outside sign of a "Bijou Dream," depicting children both in and out of school coupled with a juvenile love incident. The lighting was perfect and reminded me very much of the treatment of a very well known picture of a somewhat similar subject exhibited at the English Royal Academy by Eyre Crowe, R. A., and reproduced not only in English but in American publications. It sounds very simple and very ordinary, does it not? And yet the handling of that subject by the photographic artist, and artist he must have been to his finger tips, was superb. Go and see it, readers, for I assure you it gave me the greatest delight I have yet experienced in your great city. The lighting, the pose, the color, the vitality of the thing were amazing even to me and I venture to say I have seen not a few pictures ever since the days of moving picture invention. I said above that I admired your sense of humor. You audience appreciate anything humorous and applaud it, if applause it may be called, for you seem to be far less emotional in your appreciation than an English audience. Perhaps you are right, for do they not spoil their favorites by too much enthusiastic praise?

Another subject which an English audience would hardly tolerate was that of a trained trio of birds of prey catching and tearing to pieces poor little bunnies (by the way, I love little bunnies, they are such docile creatures, and this in the presence of (photographic) ladies who smile and watch the poor creature wriggling in its agony as the terrible bird tears piece after piece of raw flesh from its still quivering body. Really, Mr. Manager, although your pictures were technically well done, we English visitors would prefer to have something a little less gruesome. I guess your brother Jonathan will agree with me, for we are alike in our ideas of humanity as we are in our language. I lingered on at the second house for some considerable time and several more lively scenes were presented, but when a blood-stained, dying toreador, who had been gored in a bull fight, was brought in on a stretcher, I thought it was time to depart. Au revoir.

By F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

CHAPTER XI

THE SPOT.

Many operators govern their light almost entirely from the appearance of the light which shines on the gate, called the "spot." This is decidedly wrong. Aside from the length of the arc and effects produced by something wrong in the carbons the thing which should be your sole guide in regulating your light is the picture itself. Aside from the two above named things it will tell you every lamp adjustment you should make, tell you when you have made it just right, and tell you better than can anything else. Looking at a bright, brilliant spot, or sitting, as the operator must, where it strikes the eyes, is very hard on them. The writer protects the spot with a rather light (but not too light) strip of green glass. This glass, which must be made different sizes and shapes for different machines, he has a tinner bind the glass in a narrow frame of tin to which is soldered a flange, by which it is attached by two screws to the gate or cooling plate. Fig. 30 shows the idea. You must drill screw holes in the cooling plate or gate, usually, to attach it. The glass should stand out about 1½ inches and be deep enough up and down to show the whole spot, especially its top edge. This glass takes away all the glare and one may look straight at the spot as long as one likes with absolutely no eye strain at all. After you have used it a day or two you will wonder how on earth you ever got along without it, though at first it will bother you some. Use hard solder for fastening on the flange or have it made in one piece with the frame. Some operators use a metal plate instead of the glass, but the latter is best. The shield should be set back about ⅜ of an inch from the picture opening, on the operating side, of course.

The writer has said in his hand-books and in various articles, and now repeats, that the operator who produces the best results watches his picture and not his spot, making his lamp adjustments according to what he sees on the curtain. Like all other rules, however, this must be qualified. At times it will be found impossible to get the desired result by any lamp adjustment you may make. This indicates that there is something radically wrong, and nine times in ten the trouble will be found in the arc itself. Perhaps a "mushroom" has formed on the lower carbon tip. Perhaps your carbons are not set just right. But to ascertain precisely what is wrong and intelligently remedy it without stopping, you must be able to closely examine the arc. This may be done as completely as you would examine the flame of a tallow candle, and with less eye strain. When burning a crater on a new carbon before the show starts the writer frequently opens the lamphouse door and watches the whole operation for several minutes, and he is using a very powerful light on a long throw with one of the largest pictures in Chicago. He can gaze right into the crater and examine every detail of his carbon tips and does do it several times in the course of each day. How? Simply by the use of two pieces of glass, 5 inches long by 4 wide, one red and the other green. But the shade must be just right to get the best result. This is a matter of extreme importance to operators and the writer is going, at the risk of being misunderstood, to offer to send these glasses to those who wish them. Colored glass cannot be had except in cities usually, and even then it requires considerable experience to get the right shades. The glass house here charges me 20 cents for each glass, or 40 cents for both. Send me 50 cents to 116 Chicago avenue, Chicago, and I will mail you one of each. Those who think I make this offer in any other than a spirit of pure accommodation will confer a decided favor by keeping their money. I have dwelt on this matter somewhat because I consider the ability to closely examine the arc as of great importance—so great that I am willing to go to the trouble of getting the glasses and sending them out to all who will pay the cost. A red or green glass alone is of small practical value in examining the arc, unless it be a very weak one.

The top edge of the spot is the best guide in shortening the arc (closing the carbons). When the carbons are too far apart (too long an arc) there is usually a sort of nebula of light forms at the top of the spot. With direct current it will be orange with a purple center when it gets large, and with alternating it will be purple. With your carbons set just right this nebula (I use the term for want of a better) will form quite rapidly and the careful operator will not let it get more than ¼ inch wide, closing the carbons just so that it disappears. If closed more than that the light will usually sing, indicating that the arc is too short. Trim your lamp little and often is the only right rule. The nebula will vary somewhat with the set of the carbons, also with the size of carbon used, but if the carbons are set right it nearly always appears and forms a perfect guide for trimming the lamp. If it does not form it is usually an indication that your carbons are not set right or are not burning right. Another guide to carbon adjustment is to drill a ⅛-inch hole in the front of the lamphouse on a line with the top of the condenser and about 1½ inches to its left. Through this hole will be thrown on the wall two points of light with a purple band between. The width of the band will indicate the relative length of the arc. Still another way is to set the condenser vent-hole (if you have a condenser casing which will allow it) on top, or a little to the right of the top, and bend the forward edge of the hole in a trifle. Through the hole will be projected on the wall, magazine or film guard a multi-colored band edged with orange or white, indicating the relative length of the arc. But, after all, the top of the spot is the best guide for carbon adjustment and he who can read all that it tells will find it a great assistance in securing good light. The spot should be as small as possible and get a good, clear picture, since all light which does not enter the picture opening is wasted. But even this must be qualified. Looking through the light beam you will usually see a clear, white center edged, top and bottom, with a more or less deep strip of orange. This latter portion of the light is, of course, very poor for projection and it is possible that by using it you will not get as brilliant a picture as though only the white center were utilized. This depends on circumstances and how "orangy" the light is. Just what causes this phenomenon the writer is unable to say, but believes it to be due to (a) wrong set of carbons, (b) uneven heating of crater, (c) imperfect lenses, one alone or all combined.

The spot should be perfectly round. An oblong spot cornerwise of the gate indicates carbons out of line with each other sidewise. Oblong straight across the aperature indicates crater too low down. Move bottom tip ahead or top one back according to circumstances. The size of the spot is controlled by moving the lamp toward or away from the condenser. If the spot is edged with light, bright blue and has a sort of "puckered" appearance the lamp is too far from the condenser. This is a condition which will usually only appear when using long focus condensers. It is possible with short focus lenses, but it is not likely you will ever get the lamp that far back with them.

THE ELEMENTS OF ACCURACY IN MOVING PICTURE MANUFACTURE.

[From "The Bioscope."]

By Arthur S. Newman.

The production of perfect pictures, "Steady Pictures" on the screen, is, or ought to be, the aim of every exhibitor. During the last three years a great improvement has taken place, but there is still much to be done before perfection in this particular is obtained. The exhibitor is almost wholly dependent upon the manufacturer, because, unless the film be perfect, no talent in exhibiting or quality in the projector can in any way improve matters. The operator may be provided with the most perfect machinery and appliances obtainable, his lighting arrangements may be faultless, but if the manufacturer of the film subject has not also produced perfect work the exhibition can only be second rate. The exhibitor being dependent on the manufacturer, it is natural his inclination will be to purchase from a source which may be trusted for steadiness. He will, consequently, first look through the list of subjects of those producers whose pictures have the best reputation for accuracy in projection. The subject sells the picture in most cases, and no doubt a taking, or exciting, or well-staged film will sell well, even if unsteady, and will pass muster if run among a large proportion of steady ones. How much better would it be if all pictures, whatever the subject, were also steady—rock steady, I was going to say—but all pictures are steady, or said to be so, and we hear the same statement applied to nearly every projector on the market. The English seem to glory in vague terms, and the term steadiness as applied to bioscope matters is so elastic and so casually used that it now conveys little or no definite idea of what is to be expected. I have seen pictures described as "steady" when a side movement was present all the time, and this movement was as much as 1-50th of the width of the screen. Side movement is most easy to prevent, and in most cases may be cured by attention to the gate of the projector, though this is not always the case. Why cannot some definite measurement of deflection be considered the limiting point between steadiness and unsteadiness in a picture? Every manufacturer should have a testing machine, and all films in which deflection is greater than a definite amount should be rejected, and the defect in manufacture looked for and remedied as soon as found.

I will endeavor to point out the reasons of unsteadiness, and indicate the means by which they may be remedied. The faults must in the first place be apportioned fairly between the exhibitor and the manufacturer. The exhibitor works by means of his projector, and if he provides himself with a good machine and keeps the same in good running order, his responsibility may be said to cease, and any fault remaining in his department belongs to the projector itself. This machine is at the wrong end for our purpose, as we must get to the root of the matter; so for the present we will leave the projector and the exhibitor and start at the beginning, dealing only with mechanical matters, and leaving the photographic or chemical side of the subject severely alone. After the film-stock has been coated with the sensitive emulsion, the mechanical problem starts; and the first difficulty is presented to us in the even coating of a film to an exact width. It is rare nowadays to find errors arising from uneven width of film; nevertheless, the manufacturer of film subjects should gauge every roll of film before use, and if found 1-200th of an inch incorrect it should be rejected, because, if too wide, it may stick slightly in passing through the gate of a well made projector or printing machine or perforator. If too narrow, in passing through the projector, a slight swerve from side to side will lay the foundation of inaccuracies, it will be aggravated as to various later processes, and proceeded with. The method by which exact gauge can be verified most easily is to have two width gauges, one to be 1-400th of an inch larger than the exact width, and the other 1-400th of an inch smaller. The correct film will then pass easily through the larger one, and be tight in the smaller one. The next process is the perforation of the film, and here the mechanician's skill is taxed to its greatest extent. Perforation is the most important and difficult of all the operations, and the utmost care should be taken to ensure its absolute correctness. Without correct perforation, steadiness must suffer, and no after treatment can reduce in the smallest degree errors introduced at this stage. A perfectly perforated film should have the holes cleanly cut, the lines of holes should be at corresponding distances from the edges, and should be of the correct distance from one another, both across the film and in the direction of its length. The size of the hole and its shape vary somewhat in different samples, and are not "per se" of importance; those originally adopted by Messrs. Pathe seem now to be the general favorite.

The distance apart of the holes in the film measured in the direction of its length is generally called "gauge." From an engineering point of view, the word "pitch" would much better describe its measurement. The gauge, or pitch, of a film is generally agreed to contain sixty-four holes in one foot, i. e., measurement from the center of the one hole to the the center of the sixty-fifth hole, or from edge of one hole to the corresponding edge of the sixty-fifth hole. If this measurement is complied with, most people are satisfied; it is, however, only one of the requirements for the exact measurement, it being quite possible to fulfil this condition and still have a very imperfectly perforated film. It is of much greater importance that all succeeding holes on one side of the film should be exactly opposite those on the other side, in which case the precise distance taken up by sixty-four holes and spaces is not so very important. The variation of 1-500th of an inch in the foot of either side of the standard is not of any great importance, the particular point is that the perforation should be evenly distanced. The exact gauge, or pitch, is only important where a continuous or rotary printer is employed, when to obtain absolute accuracy in the printing operation, it would be necessary to have the positive film perforated to suit the developed negative from which the print is to be taken. In order to do this the negative film will require to be of a long gauge, to allow of shrinkage in development, or the positive film could be perforated to a gauge somewhat shorter than the normal, the amount of difference being determined by the amount of shrinkage to which the special sample of film-stock used is liable during the development and drying. When in use the perforator must be kept scrupulously clean and well oiled; all old or dirty oil being wiped from the working parts each morning before starting. The gauge, or the pitch, of perforation must be verified from time to time to make certain that all is proceeding rightly, and the speed of the machine and the temperature of the room kept as even as possible.

PICTURE FILMS.

A patent has been taken out for an invention which renders it possible to carry out the development of moving picture films in the form of daylight-loading spools by daylight or by any actinic light, without the employment of a separate dark chamber for transferring the exposed film to the developing reel or flexible apron. A metal chamber of a cylindrical shape, with closed ends which are fitted with small holes for the inlet and outlet of air and liquid, the holes being trapped so as to prevent the entry of light, is provided with a lateral opening which can be covered light-tight by a hinged door, which has an aperture which can be covered when required by a spool box adapted to receive the spool of exposed film to be treated. This spool box is adapted to slide over or otherwise cover the aperture in the hinged door, so as to exclude the light. Within the chamber is a flanged reel with spindle which can be rotated from the outside of the chamber. The film is wound on a flexible apron with thickened edges of rubber or other suitable material having longitudinal ribs, the apron itself being made preferably of celluloid; the thickened edges are by preference attached to the apron by stitching along the depressed center of each thickened edge. The apron can at one end be clipped or otherwise attached to the reel spindle and coiled round it together with the film. The thickened edges of the apron keep the sensitive surface of the film from contact with itself and with the supporting apron as is well-known. Within the chamber is an inner portion of a wall bent to the curve of the outer wall, and between the two there is a space; this inner wall extends from end to end of the chamber, and in conjunction with the ends of the chamber forms a light trap; the space between the two walls also forming an aperture for the passage of the flexible apron.

The O. M. Edwards Company, of Syracuse, N. Y., are placing upon the market a film cabinet at a moderat price. This cabinet is built to pass the examination of the Board of Underwriters. It is made of rolled pickled steel, thoroughly baked and finished in olive green, with a decorative gold strip. It contains six shelves and has the capacity of holding 50 reels.

Some features are introduced not heretofore attempted in any similar cabinet, viz.: the door has a spring attachment closing it automatically and thus avoiding any possibility of it remaining open through the carelessness of an employee.

The locking device consists of the latest arrangement in lock design, having a bolt at the top, bottom and side of door, all being operated by one knob on the outside, each bolt holding the door tightly closed by an independent spring pressure.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

The moving picture business has now apparently settled down to its Summer level. The exhibiting houses that are in operation will in all probability remain open throughout the present and coming season, unless, of course, the owners decide to temporarily close for a brief period in order to make alterations or renovate the places before embarking for the Fall and Winter. The business is now at its minimum; from this period any changes that take place will be in the direction of improvement. The manufacturers and film exchanges report that the past ten days have developed very encouraging prospects. In many quarters the exchanges are placing orders for increased supply of subjects. This increase is not of a substantial nature that would justify the statement that a boom is on again, but it evidences a very encouraging revival. Most of the orders are placed with instructions that the increased supplies commence with the latter part of the month. No one in the business looks for a material revival before the latter part of August, but all agree that there will be a well defined movement toward that end from this time.

All the conservative men in the business concur in the opinion that the pictures will be more popular and bring larger returns during the coming Fall and Winter season than at any time since the Spring of 1908, when the high water mark was reached. This opinion is based upon the remarkable hold the pictures have retained upon the patrons of amusements despite the Summer season. While those who have weathered the hot season have not been favored with dividend-paying patronage, they have been favored with business that in many respects has surprised them under the conditions. This can be accounted for in a measure. The houses remaining open have secured some of the patronage of other houses whose managers would, or could, not keep open for the Summer. The situation brings to view an interesting point—a demonstration of the old adage that it is an ill wind that blows nobody good. Had all the houses been on equal terms as to accommodations, ventilation and other means for catering to hot weather audiences, they all would no doubt have closed down at least for a period during the Summer. The natural falling off of patronage would not have left enough for any of them to take in sufficient money to more than half pay expenses.

Reports are current that there will be a surprising increase in the number of new houses during the coming season. In a measure the reports are well founded, but they must not be misinterpreted. While there will be a great many new places, the aggregate number of houses will not exceed the number in operation before the Summer season set in. It is semi-officially stated in this city that many managers will find difficulty in getting their places re-opened. When application is made to the municipal authorities for renewal of license, they will be confronted with demands for improvements as to the conditions of their places, such as enlargement and increase of exits, better ventilation, and a general perfection of details to bring the places nearer the plane of regular amusement houses. If the authorities carry out their intentions, many places that closed for the Summer will remain with closed doors. In some cases the houses are not large enough to permit the alterations contemplated. Some of them will get by through leasing or purchasing adjoining properties and throwing the new and old places into one structure. Many exhibitors will be unable to do this, either on account of a lack of capital or the owners of adjoining properties refusing to sell, or holding them at prohibitive prices. It will thus be seen that many small places will pass out of existence as picture houses. The man with the money and plenty of room will then step in, which will be a very fortunate event for the picture business generally. The fellow who steps in as successor to the little man will come to stay and add to the feature of permanency.

I was surprised to find closed a large place that was opened for the Summer season. The owner spent considerable time and money on it and was doing good business, the location being an excellent one. Upon inquiring as to the cause of the closing, I learned that the owner commenced well in his arrangements, but did not go far enough. He did not end well. In outward appearance his place was a fine one, and the accommodations for the patrons were on the same scale, but he tried to cut down expenses on branches of work of a technical nature. Some of the municipal departments detected faults in the installation of the projecting apparatus, the wiring, etc. I was inclined to think at first, with others, that the case looked very much like one of those things called "a shake-down," but found that the owner had been repeatedly given an opportunity to bring the place within the requirements. These the owner disregarded, assuming the position that as the arrangements were good enough to pass examination when he opened the place they should carry him through the Summer. One afternoon the place was summarily closed and remained closed for nearly two weeks. In the meantime the regulations were complied with, but at more than double the cost for which the same work could have been done originally. The money spent in doing the cheap work was lost, the materials used were a loss, new materials had to be purchased, the tearing out of the old materials was an expense and the work of putting in the new had to be paid for. Add to this the loss in receipts during the time the place was closed and it is not difficult to see that what was at first considered economy was really extravagance. This case furnishes an excellent object lesson to exhibitors. Money used in doing a thing right is well spent. Do not depend entirely upon official inspectors. They vary so much in characteristics that they are very poor subjects upon which to place reliance. The official who looks over your place when you are about to open may have little ability for his line. Argument is frequently made that if an official inspector passes a place, that relieves the owner of any further concern, but this argument will not hold water. The original inspection may be made by an incompetent or indifferent man—I might say a pliable man. So long as this inspector is on the job the exhibitor may sail along serenely. But changes are frequently made in the assignment of such officials; if they are not sent to other districts, they are removed, or they may resign. Then a new man comes along, and if he understands his business and will stand for nothing but a compliance with the regulations the exhibitor will have his troubles. No chances should be taken. All the money the work calls for should be spent upon it. The proper materials should be secured and they should not be butchered by a man who is willing to work for a little less than that asked by the man who knows how to do it. It is far better to have an expert on the work at the beginning than be compelled to run after him to get you out of trouble. Besides, as has been shown, it is much cheaper. The higher priced man will fit up your place as it should be. When he is through, the official inspection is merely a formality and it is very seldom that alterations are required. The case of the exhibitor to whom I have referred is only one of hundreds. Thousands of dollars have been thrown away by exhibitors in like manner. Exhibitors contemplating alterations or the opening of new places should profit by the experiences.

"THE GOLD NUGGET"—WESTERN SCENERY IN A WESTERN SUBJECT.

By Wild West.

In this picture there is a very marked improvement, especially in the photographing; in fact it is almost perfect. And at last we see that the producer has succeeded in finding Western scenery which gives great effect to the picture. The story, which does not seem very clear, is acted with good results, though the costumes and the makeup of the Westerners seem to be somewhat of a burlesque, in fact no one can but help noticing the amateurish makeup of the cowboys or miners, whichever they are intended to be. And you can also see very plainly that the riders are only novices at the game, for their mounting and dismounting is very crude and awkward. Yet for all that no one can look upon this picture and say that it is not a great improvement upon ones that the company has been turning out lately. Someone's criticisms have benefited. The scenery in all its branches (with the exception of the exterior of the house, ranch, cabin or whatever it is intended to be) is very much of the Western style, and the hair covered furniture is somewhat out of order for a mining district cabin or house. With a little more body to the story and little more accuracy the picture would have been par excellence. And when the cowboy actors start in pursuit of someone it does not look natural for them to ride to a certain mark and then all make a square cornered turn as if on dress parade, and when nearing the camera to take off their hats as if saluting some commanding officer. You see all these little things detract from the story. But nevertheless the picture upon the whole is a great improvement and congratulations are extended to all concerned.

Fourth Semi-Annual Meeting of Film Service Association

July 16, 17, 18, at Atlantic City.

Charlie Calehuff, Bill Steiner and Will C. Smith in front of Young's Hotel.

The fourth semi-annual meeting of the Film Service Association was held at Young's Hotel, Atlantic City, on July 16, 17 and 18. In the opinion of everyone present the event was the most enjoyable in the history of the Association. An attendance of eighty per cent. of the membership did not show lack of interest in the organization, and the spirit of cordiality which prevailed was indeed encouraging to witness.

The Executive Committee met at the hotel on Thursday afternoon, July 15, and arranged the programme for the occasion. As the offices of President and Vice-President had become vacant, Secretary Herbert L. Miles presided, and he deserves great praise for the manner in which he performed his duties. The Executive Committee met again on Friday morning and the first regular business session took place on Friday afternoon. Secretary Miles called the meeting to order and read the following letter of resignation from former President Wm. H. Swanson:

Chicago, July 13, 1909.

Mr. Herbert Miles, Secretary Film Service Association,
Young's Hotel, Atlantic City, N. J.

Dear Sir: Rumors have reached me the past few weeks that any but licensees of the Motion Picture Patents Company would not be considered desirable as members of the Film Service Association. I presume this has emanated from the offices of the Motion Picture Patents Company, and, having no desire whatever to be associated with or considered a member of any organization domineered or controlled by any other force outside itself, this being one of the contentions I had made in the first year of the life of the Film Service Association when the representatives of the Edison Company, as well as other allied manufacturers endeavored and did elect the slate of their own choosing for officers of the Film Service Association, I, therefore, take this opportunity of expressing my most sincere and deep-felt appreciation of the honor that was conferred upon me at the last regular meeting in being elected president of the association, and also assuring every member of the many pleasant memories of the individuals comprising it, as well as the body itself, which memory will live as long as my faculties remain, and be valued as the most memorable in my existence.

Therefore, it is with greater regrets than I have the ability to convey in mere cold type the desire on my part to offer my resignation as president of the Film Service Association to take effect immediately upon receipt of this letter.

My most earnest wish is that you will elect leaders among yourselves who will have the best interest of the organization at heart, and who will have the courage of their convictions, thereby encouraging and upbuilding the business, which is sadly in need of it from either quarter, whether licensee or independent.

Life itself is of short duration; its tribulations and contentions are the spice required to its enjoyment, and while it would be a great pleasure to personally meet all my old valued associates once more, I can only say in conclusion that I wish each and every individual long life, prosperity and business success.

Yours very truly,

WM. H. SWANSON.

A Merry Group.

Letters of resignation were also read from Carl Laemmle, Vice-President, and from A. L. Kessell, of the Empire Film Exchange.

Nominations were then called for the offices of President and Vice-President, and Messrs. A. L. Gilligham and Wm. Steiner were elected to the respective offices.

President Gilligham then called for the reading of the minutes of the last meeting, which were read and approved. Treasurer Leiber submitted his report, which showed that the finances of the Association were in an encouraging condition.

Messrs. R. A. Rowland, of the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Co., and F. J. Howard, of Boston, were elected to fill vacancies on the Executive Board.

Sentry Alfred Weiss reported that Mr. A. L. Hayman, of the Motion Picture Service Co., of Syracuse, N. Y., and Mr. J. E. Willis, of the Kleine Optical Co., New York City, were at the door, with proper credentials, and they were admitted to membership.

Resolutions were passed admitting the licensed manufacturers to honorary membership and extending an invitation to the representatives of the licensed machine manufacturers present to remain as the guests of the Association.

It was then voted that the initiation fee of $100 be discontinued and the regular annual dues be $25 per year, which sum was immediately paid over to the Treasurer by the majority of the members present.

The members then adjourned to traverse the board walk in rolling chairs which had been provided by the Executive Committee, and at 10.30 they met at the Dunlap Hotel to partake of a supper and entertainment provided by Mr. S. Lubin, of Philadelphia.

On Saturday forenoon the members engaged in a bathing session, which was marred by an incident referred to elsewhere, and at 2 P. M. another business session was called to order in the hotel. Prolonged discussion took place on the order sent out by the American Express Co. to the film exchanges and which was published in last week's Moving Picture World. Representatives of the manufacturers and the Patents Company said that they would take up the matter with the express companies, and a committee was appointed, consisting of the members of the Executive Committee residing in the East, to interview the managers of the express companies and try to get the order rescinded. It was pointed out that the order was uncalled for at this time, as non-inflammable film would very shortly be in general use.

Mr. Pelzer, of the Edison Company, introduced a motion to appoint a committee to interview the Traffic Managers' Association in regard to obtaining lower rates west of the Mississippi.

Mingle & Wood presented a very complete scheme in regard to obtaining insurance on film exchanges and theaters on more reasonable terms. The members were much interested in the proposition.

Secretary Miles presented a scheme for the formation of a subsidiary purchasing company for buying parts of machinery and other supplies in large quantities for the benefit of the members of the Association. A committee was appointed to draw up the scheme in proper shape for action by the Association.

In the evening an official banquet was given in the Chevy-Chase room of the Marlborough-Blenheim Hotel, at which 83 covers were laid for 43 delegates, 25 alternate members and invited guests, 10 honorary members and 5 members of the press.

President A. L. Gilligham proved to be a most excellent toastmaster and called upon many of the delegates and guests for speeches. Treasurer Lieber, for the exchanges, made the longest speech and handed out some excellent advice to his brother exchange man on the conduct of the business and its future possibilities.

Mr. H. N. Marvin responded to the toast of the Motion Picture Patents Company. In referring to the work that this company had already done in regulating and improving business conditions he said that it was the desire of the members of the Patents Company and all the licensed manufacturers to work in harmony with the exchanges and the licensed exhibitors in placing the entire business upon a more solid footing, raising it in the public estimation and working together with the great possibilities of its future in view. He contrasted the dignified and harmonious sessions of the present convention with the stormy meetings in the early history of the Association, ascribing it to the gradual elimination of those elements which had been attracted to the business as a get-rich-quick scheme, but whose business methods, if not governed, meant the ruin of a great and growing industry.

Loving cups were presented to the following former officers: Former President Wm. H. Swanson, F. C. Aiken, James B. Clark, Percy L. Waters and F. J. Howard.

Fat Men's Race, F. J. Howard in the lead.

Mr. Rowland wore a sun-bonnet.

President Gilligham proposed a vote of thanks to Secretary Miles for his energetic work, which had contributed to the success of the meeting. Alfred Weiss, of the Reception Committee, whose smooth-shaven face wore a continuous smile, also worked hard to make things pleasant for everyone. The representative of the New York "Clipper," with a committee of Messrs. Rock and Hayman, provided some excellent vaudeville talent that was highly appreciated, and the most pleasant evening that the members have ever spent together terminated at 11.30 by the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

WHAT THE WILD WAVES WERE SAYING.

That S. Lubin, despite his years, showed more vitality and was a better swimmer than many of the younger men.

That Baxter Morton, in a closely fitting bathing suit, was the Adonis of the beach parade.

That the rooster took to the water like a duck. Both Mr. Berst and Mr. Montague were as happy and behaved like boys let out of school.

That Mr. Carrick and Mr. Kessell led in the free-for-all race, which looks good for the Independents.

That the editor of the World will leave his camera behind next time he goes to Atlantic City—maybe.

That Mr. and Mrs. Howard seem to grow younger as the years go by.

That "Pop" Rock did everything but brave the ocean, even to furnishing the bail bond for an arrested "criminal."

That our contemporaries missed an excellent subject for a cartoon by not being present with a camera when the "arrest" was made.

That Will Smith earned the gratitude of the World for his solicitous efforts in freeing the desperate "criminal."

That Mr. Marvin swam out so far beyond the breakers that his portly form was almost lost to view.

That Mr. Pelzer sent his wife away after the first day and sang with the boys, "My Wife's Gone to the Country, Hurrah."

That Mrs. Roebuck surprised her husband by unexpectedly arriving at the hotel on Saturday night just to "keep an eye on him."

That Al Hayman has an athletic figure which should cause recalcitrant customers to beware.

That Mr. Clark dodged the presentation of the loving cups to get out of making a speech. How about Waters?

That the ladies—bless 'em—added life and grace to the party.

That the "bunch" was the most orderly and desirable ever entertained at Young's Hotel—at least so said the manager to the representative of the World.

ATLANTIC CITY BARS PHOTOGRAPHERS.

The duty of a newspaper to its readers sometimes exposes its representatives to unsuspected dangers. The Moving Picture World provided its representative with a hand camera to obtain some mementos of the convention at Atlantic City for publication. We obtained a few which are published in this week's issue, but we paid the penalty for our enterprise. It seems that Atlantic City has recently passed an ordinance prohibiting the taking of photographs on the beach under a heavy penalty, but the enterprising authorities of this world-famed ocean resort are so astute that they have kept this precious document all to themselves and have not warned the unsuspecting public by sign or publication of their edict. While the pictures were being made, an officer approached and said we must stop, but the members of the party gathered around and assured him that we were of the party and that the pictures were not being made for commercial purposes. Permission was then granted to proceed, but when the last plate was exposed we were placed under arrest and marched away to "explain matters to the sergeant," which meant an arrest.

A member of the party, who fortunately was not in his bathing suit, furnished bail. When the case came up for trial the recorder remarked that it was the first arrest under the new law and they desired to make a test case. By thus getting the matter aired in the papers they no doubt considered that they would be relieved of the expense of advertising the ordinance. In fining the World representative $10, the Atlantic City authorities therefore conferred upon us the unenviable distinction of being made an example of for future delinquents.

We have procured a copy of the ordinance, which we believe to be necessary in the government of such a cosmopolitan resort, but it is absurd to suppose that any city can make private laws and enforce them without giving due notice of their existence. Moreover it is clear that we did not violate any clause of the ordinance, as it is printed, therefore the end is not yet.

The Atlantic City newspapers one and all deplored the uncalled-for arrest. The following editorial, which was printed in large type in the Atlantic City "Evening Union" of July 21, is certainly not a good advertisement for that Summer resort:

DIPLOMACY ON THE BEACH.

The case of James P. Chalmers, a New York publisher, arrested and fined $10 for taking pictures on the beach, shows the need of the exercise of tact and diplomacy by beach policemen in their dealings with strangers in the resort.

The New Yorker was not aware of the fact that professional photographers are barred from the beach, nor did he know that under police regulations amateurs are required to procure a permit before they can lawfully take snapshots with a hand camera. It was clearly the duty, then, of policemen to courteously inform him of these requirements.

Instead, he was first threatened and then arrested, a development that will be deplored by every right-thinking citizen of the city. The appearance of the naturally indignant defendant in the police court was sufficient to convince any reasonable observer that he was not of the type of visitors who deliberately disregard public regulations.

Arrests of this kind on the beach front must be stopped. Visitors must be treated with every possible consideration. They cannot be expected to know about every local law. In many places visitors are encouraged to bring cameras and take all the pictures they see fit. Atlantic City's statute forbidding the professional photographers to practice highwayman tactics on the strand, is a splendid thing, but the uninformed stranger who uses a camera there should not be classed in the same category for a minute.

The amateur photographer was never a dangerous law-breaker and the over-zealous policeman should be promptly apprised of that fact by superiors who have some sense of the fitness of things.

The Film Import and Trading Co. have contracted for the whole output of the Centaur Film Co., and are negotiating for the exclusive selling agency for other manufacturers.

Phoenix Film will soon be represented by a special agent in New York. Their latest production, "Her Favorite Tune," has all the elements of dramatic effect to keep the audience interested from start to finish.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

From all I have read and seen lately, the open air moving picture theater has become a permanent feature of the entertainment situation here. Like everything else that is good, it is probably only in its infancy. It was pointed out in these pages some time ago that the open air life led by the people of this country in the Summer, gives the open air theater a great chance of success. After all it is a logical development that has been coming for a considerable time.

Quite recently your readers will remember Miss Maude Adams played Joan of Arc in the open to an audience of 15,000 persons. Then we have had regularly organized shows of players, such as the Ben Greet Company, which gives even Shakespeare in the open. It has escaped general notice that the first theatrical performances given by Birbage and others were conducted in open air theaters.

* * *

Then, in recent times, there has been a revival of the pageant idea, in which historical scenes have been enacted in the open. Altogether, then, it will be seen that the outdoor play is an idea of some antiquity and that it has been popular in some form or other for many hundreds of years. Clearly, therefore, the outdoor moving picture follows a natural lead in this direction. Climate necessarily plays an important part in this matter. And the climate of the United States is for the most part of the Summer an equable one and conducive to successful outdoor entertainment. It is doubtful, in proof of this, if such a vast enterprise as Coney Island would or could be successful in any other part of the world. Certainly in some parts of England it would be a very hazardous enterprise, for you could never count upon three consecutive days of fine weather.

All this makes for the success of the open air moving picture theater or airdome, as it is called. The airdome, it seems, leaped into popularity two years ago. From inquiries I have made during the past two weeks its popularity has so firmly established itself amongst New Yorkers that we may look for it to become quite an established institution. Speaking personally, some of the most enjoyable intervals I have had with the moving picture has been made in the open air. Indeed, last week, when I visited Coney Island and did not see some moving pictures in the open that I saw there last year I came away with something like disappointment. Probably some pictures are being shown there, but the Island is such a vast place that it is impossible for even the most inveterate pleasure seeker, like myself, to do everything at once.

As an example of what can be done in this direction, let me take the case of the open air theater at 138th street, New York City. Here recently the entertainment was so popular amongst the patrons of this place that the seating capacity of 2,400 had to be doubled. Round about July 4th each performance was attended by 2,500 people. Tasteful decorations were provided and the ladies were each given a souvenir. More than that, the pictures shown were of the latest and best kind, the newest illustrated songs were put on, and the music was of the nature that has been pleaded for in these pages more than once. The entire conduct of this theater merits the warmest praise, for it is in the hands of men who look after the safety and comfort of the public, and who take every care that the entertainment is of the cleanest and brightest kind.

I have taken my entertainment in the open air at nights in many large cities of Europe: in Paris, Antwerp, Brussels, London, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Manchester and Liverpool, and here in New York City; and I have never failed to observe that if you properly appeal to the eye and the ear of the people you will keep your patrons when once you have attracted them. There are two obvious ways of getting the patronage of the moving picture public; a public of many many millions in the United States to-day: one is with good pictures, and the other with good music. Both of these ends have been dwelt upon over and over again in these pages in recent months. For my part I do not care whether you put this programme before me inside of the theater or outside of the theater. I am just as pleased. But I am bound to say that on these hot Summer nights when the thermometer rather contraindicates the comfort of indoor entertainments, I give the preference to the alfresco variety.

In other words I want to sit and enjoy my moving picture, my song slide and my music with a comfortable seat and a good cigar and such other refreshments as my pocket or my principles allow me to take. And what I want I think millions of other people want. I don't object to the show being free, whether it be Coney Island or elsewhere; I don't object to paying the humble 5 or 10 cents for admission, all I want in the months of June, July, August and September, is the facility of being able to enjoy good moving pictures in the open air. And what I want, as I have said already, I am sure millions of other people want.

From all this it seems to me that the airdome idea is likely to extend and develop in future seasons. It is a factor in the entertainment situation to be reckoned with. After all, indoor entertainment is the most rational and most beneficial. Most of us live a very considerable percentage of our lives out of doors and take our pleasure there. If we must have pleasure, as assuredly I think we must, let our pleasure be of the best. And certainly at this time of the year, under the star-lit skies, we ought to be able to gratify a reasonable demand for good music in any section of a city in which we happen to be living. When you realize that a band performance in Central Park on a Sunday afternoon will attract many thousands of people, as it did last Sunday, from all parts of the city, it must be conceded that there is always a large number of the population who will respond to any efforts made on their behalf to provide it with good, cheap, wholesome, alfresco entertainment.

The family doctors of the Bronx are prescribing the open-air theater for the population in that section of this city. Why? you ask. Because in an open-air theater you can sit in the fresh atmosphere and be constantly breathing into your lungs pure air, whilst, in a closed theater, in the Summer, it is always more or less stuffy. When we visited the open-air theater at 138th street and Third avenue, the other night, it looked to us as though the whole of the Bronx visited this particular one, as it was pretty well crowded. The place was decorated with flags, bunting and Japanese lanterns. They show first run pictures and employ two of the very best projecting machines on the market. It is impossible to hear the running of the machine, even if you stand near the operating booth. The orchestra renders classical selections; the vocalist sang the latest songs with very nicely colored slides. The courtesy of the employees is up to the highest standard, and Mr. Joseph V. Vielbert, the proprietor, is always on the alert to see that everything is kept in order.

The Audubon Theater, at 521 West 181st street, on Washington Heights, appears to have caught the eye of the public in regard to featuring their billboards. Some of the houses that plaster up their signboards show very poor taste; in fact, most signs are crude. The work on the signs in front of the Audubon Theater has not been done in a hurry. They have been got up with pains and therefore are taken care of. Let us illustrate what we mean: A sign pasted on the billboard of a theater is covered with white glazed paper; all the creases have been obliterated; there are two strips of red and blue one inch wide used for a border. The strips are about one and a half inches apart; the title is boxed in oblong with single strips of red for the top feature and blue for the bottom one. Only square letters are used, and no shading is utilized. This is a very neat sign. The proprietor of this theater does not believe in displaying posters which are not true.

As the declared enemy of the common house fly, Henry V. Andrews sailed for Europe on the Minnetonka last week. He went on a mission for Edward Hatch, Jr., of the Merchants' Association Pollution Committee, which is engaged in a national campaign against the related plagues of water pollution and flies. The committee will conduct its war with moving pictures. Mr. Andrews will procure films so interesting that they will appeal by their oddity to the spectator in a cent arcade and at the same time preach a sermon on the disease-bearing habits of the insect.

BAYONNE BAN ON SIGEL PICTURES.

Mayor Pierre Garven of Bayonne, N. J., instructed Chief of Police John Yore last week not to permit an exhibition of moving pictures depicting the murder of Elsie Sigel. The Mayor delared such pictures would have a bad effect on the morals of children. Several exhibitions which were to have been given last week were stopped and the proprietors warned.

Comments on the Week's Films.

"The Egyptian Mystery."—A comedy from the Edison studio which has elements of novelty and good acting which make it interesting and funny. Mysterious disappearances, or the manipulation of articles to make them disappear under the hand of a surprised individual, always supply humorous situations, and these elements have been made the most of in this film. The bewildered iceman, who sees one thing after another vanish as he touches them, and for reasons which he cannot understand, furnishes a bit of comedy which is worth seeing. And when, finally, he, too, goes, the merriment reaches its height. The film is good photographically and the disappearances are all excellently managed. There is not a suspicion of a hitch in the entire film.

"The Escape from Andersonville."—The Kalem Company has produced a film under this subject which deserves long life and should be seen everywhere, since it will have the merit of fixing more firmly in the minds of the younger generations some of the facts concerning the sufferings of those engaged in the Civil War and it will undoubtedly arouse in the minds of many a desire to know more about the struggle and what it cost. This film shows graphically the horrors of the prison pen, then it represents the construction of a tunnel through which the prisoners might escape, the soldiers at liberty after they have completed their tunnel and have crawled through it, the flight through the swamp, with the swamp itself reproduced accurately; the finding of a Northern sympathizer, who assisted them, and the pursuit on the locomotive. Here one's nerves grow tense under the influence of the gradually lessening space between the two locomotives, but the breaking down of the Confederate engine enables the Federal soldiers to escape. Another dramatic situation develops when orders are telegraphed ahead to blow up the bridge under the fugitive engine. The explosion occurs according to orders, but it is too late. The engine has passed over the mine before it explodes and the locomotive still moves forward. Then the film closes with a home-coming which warms the heart and brings tears to the eyes. It would be difficult to select any particular scene in this film as being better than others. They are all good and they all suggest many other scenes which render the film more interesting because of this unseen influence. Sometimes the visions which accompany a film of this character are fully as interesting as the film itself. So far as the details are concerned, the writer saw the film in company with a soldier, who said he believed it was as nearly accurate as it could be made now. The scenes seemed to him to portray what he had been told regarding such escapes and pursuits, with unusual fidelity, and the photography is good in the main. The film is well worth running for its historical value, to say nothing of the sentiment which will be aroused by its exhibition.

"The Invisible Thief."—A Pathe film which gives another illustration of tthe trick work which enables men in motion pictures to disappear at will. The situations in this are funny, and there is abundance of opportunity for laughter when the policeman undertakes to seize the thief and he vanishes. The tricks are good and there is plenty of fun throughout. It leaves the audience in very good humor, marveling at the many changes.

"The Lost Tie."—This Gaumont picture illustrates a modification of the old lost collar button story when the gentleman's tie mysteriously disappears. It adds to the amusement to see it dangling from the back of his collar all the time and the fun is boisterous when he discovers that he had it with him while he was searching for it.

"Birth and Adventures of a Fountain Pen."—In this film the Vitagraph Company has achieved a success in what may be termed two ways. They have produced a good industrial picture, illustrating the processes of manufacture of an all but universal instrument, while at the same time they have given it a touch of humor by reproducing some of the adventures which may befall an ordinary fountain pen in the course of its life. It is unnecessary to describe the processes in detail, but the Vitagraph people are to be commended for securing such faithful reproductions of the methods of manufacture followed in the largest fountain pen factory in the world. The second picture, which is a series of magic drawings executed by the fountain pen which has just been seen manufactured, is interesting and amusing, in that it develops some curious pictures that constantly dissolve into others equally interesting and amusing.

"The Renunciation."—A Biograph comedy which has much of interest in it and holds the closest attention of the audience from beginning to end. It is a Western mining camp, with a love story, rivals and a duel with bowie knives over a girl which both men, long chums, wanted. She discovers the difficulty and parts the fighters, and as a climax introduces her intended in the shape of one of the most effeminate dudes the sun ever shone on. The rough miners present such a strong contrast that there is no describing the difference. They both mutter something unprintable and leave the pair. The acting of the company and the photographic quality go to make this film unusually interesting and the audience is sure to be pleased with it. The staging is managed with fidelity and there is a snap to it which is irresistible, while the dramatic climaxes are all sufficiently interesting to hold the attention unabated.

"A Nugget of Gold."—A drama from Lubin which tells a story of Western life, in which there are finds of gold, with accompanying jealousy, an attempted burglary and kidnapping of another's wife which was foiled just as it begun, the pursuit and capture of the thieves who took the miner's gold, their execution and the happy reunion of the family. Like all Lubin's Western dramas, this one is alive from beginning to end. There is the mining camp, the rush and whirl of cowboys and miners, the greasers and other elements which are required to reproduce the atmosphere of such a community. Lubin's players understand the life they depict and in most instances their work is true to it. The details in this are managed with more than ordinary fidelity to the originals and there is a movement and swing to the action which aptly depicts the life it is supposed to represent, all of which adds to its interest and increases its attractiveness. This film should be popular everywhere.

"Behind the Mask."—A drama from the Pathe studios in which a mask ball is utilized as a means for settling a misunderstanding between a husband and wife. The opening scenes which illustrate the misunderstanding are interesting, then comes the ball, and the Pathes always make these occasions well worth seeing. The denouement in the supper room when the husband and wife discover each other's identity and patch up their difficulty is good, too. The film, as a whole, is interesting and is a welcome diversion from some that have gone before.

"The Fiddlers."—A Pathe trick picture in which a company of minstrels are represented as doing interesting and amusing tricks. The picture serves to break an otherwise heavy programme with a good comedy sketch.

"Catching Turtles."—This might be termed an industrial picture, since it illustrates, as only the Pathes can illustrate such a subject, the turtle catching which is a pursuit of some importance in the tropics. The scenes give a clear comprehension of how this is done.

"The Missionary and the Maid."—An Edison drama which has a good deal of originality about it. The genius who conceived the idea of a love story in the missionary field of Africa deserves encouragement. Here is a missionary who has braved all the terrors of the cannibals' cooking methods, and other features of African life which are not conducive to quiet nerves, but when a dusky damsel weighing four hundred pounds or more attempts to make love to him and seize him in a passionate embrace he objected. But it was useless and the wedding preparations went forward merrily. But just at the critical juncture a warrior, who had sought the mountain-like belle's hand, returned and forced the missionary into mortal combat. But another diversion occurs. Happy at the chance of escape, even through death's door and the cook's department, the missionary lights his pipe. Every heathen except the lovely maiden disappears. That was a new one on them. Just as he is about to accept the martyrdom because he can't escape he wakes up and finds it is a dream. But all thoughts of the missionary field are abandoned and he returns to the world, the flesh and the other of the triology. The film is a mirth producer of merit, well acted, adequately staged and well photographed. It should be a winner.

"Which Is Which?"—An Essanay comedy which takes a fling at the titled personages of the Old World who come here for American wives. Like all the Essanay comedies, it is carried out with a dash and go which makes it very attractive. The plan of disguising oneself as a lord to work mischief to the other bogus lord, is original, and leads to amusing complications. The story ends happily in mutual explanations and the securing of his sweetheart by the American. There are some weaknesses in the photography, though they are largely of a minor character. Otherwise the film is an acceptable comedy.

"The New Cop."—If the new policemen enforced the rules or the laws literally there would indeed be all kinds of trouble as a result. In this interesting and lively comedy from the Essanay studio that is exactly what a newly appointed officer does, and his amusing blunders are the basis of the picture. The company's comedian succeeds in creating a great deal of sport before the film ends. Technically it is good, and the many amusing experiences of the policeman, including his sudden entrance to the police station in the relentless grip of a ferocious bulldog, are funny and keep the audience laughing.

"Conchita, the Spanish Belle."—A Gaumont based upon illicit love and a misunderstanding which almost wrecks a home. The story is told in an interesting way, though it must be confessed that it is not an especially interesting story. These films which assume to represent the outcome of illicit love, leading to duelling and other disagreeable features, are frequently good dramatically and scenically, but one can scarcely commend them, because they inculcate erroneous impressions of life. Such occasions are undoubtedly common enough, but they are not pleasant subjects for motion pictures.

"The Wizard's Walking Stick."—A film from the Gaumont studio which presents comic, magic and mysterious scenes in an exceptionally artistic series of pictures, beautifully tinted and reproduced with excellent photographic quality. These magic films are entertaining and are much more to be desired than the pictures which introduce tragedy and develop stories of jealousy, bloodshed and crime.

"The Peasant Prince."—A drama from Selig which has all the elements which go to make up a thrilling story of love, jealousy and the rest. The peasant assumes the disguise of a prince to be near the lady he loves, is accepted by her and then torn from her for a short time by cruel fate, only to be restored as her lover when she understands it all. The story is one of those that appeal irresistibly to the average audience, and so well is it staged and so interesting is it throughout that there is never any question about the satisfaction of those who see it. A good love story is always popular, and the capable company which develops this one has caught the spirit of the piece and interprets the author's thought with striking fidelity and with a dash which carries one along with it, almost unconscious that it is a picture and not an actual scene. The acting of the young artist is exceptionally good and it is fittingly supported by Pauline, the girl whom so many loved. The scenes are spirited, and even during the duel there is intense interest in the outcome. When Claude hands back the sword to his disarmed opponent there is regret expressed, and one woman was heard to say: "Oh, what made him do that?" The ending is happy, showing that an artist may become wealthy and influential, though they are so many times represented differently. This is one of the best stories and one of the best films of the week and deserves a long run. It will hold the interest of any audience from beginning to end.

"Two Cousins."—A Lubin which develops a story of considerable dramatic interest around the making of a will and the consequent jealousy of a cousin. A hypnotist adds to the interest of the occasion and the picture indicates in some degree the possibilities of hypnotism when applied to criminal purposes. The acting is good, most of the dramatic situations being developed as strongly as possible. But one doesn't exactly relish the introduction of poisoning scenes and the final death of the conspirator when confronted by those she has led into crime. While the dramatic interest of the film is conceded and there is little to criticise in the technical development of the picture, still it leaves a disagreeable sensation behind. Possibly this is indicative of its power; but at best it is unpleasant.

"The Friend of the Family."—A Biograph life drama. Unquestionably such things actually occur in real life, though it is hard to credit them. Perhaps it is possible in some ways to excuse the action of the man in becoming infatuated with the girl whom he meets. She is pretty enough to attract anyone. Yet that he should desert his family for another is not right, and the tearful attempts of his people to win him back are disturbing. The note which the child writes is very touching and later exerts a powerful influence. Perhaps the most dramatic feature of all is the sudden entrance of another man, the friend, and the representation of a woman's fickleness in giving up the one who has followed her and is even then ready to elope with her, for another. The lesson is plain and might be heeded by men who are more or less under the influence of a similar spell. The final scene, where the father is embracing his boy, with the mother looking on from the staircase, is touching and arouses many tender emotions. There is no fault to find with the photographic quality and the acting is quite in keeping with the recent development of this company's work in the silent drama. It would be difficult to suggest an improvement.

AN IMPORTANT CHANGE IN THE MOTION PICTURE MAP.

One of the most notable changes that has occurred recently within the ranks of the licensed film rental exchanges is one of very recent occurrence in which Samuel S. Hutchinson, of Chicago, disposed of his stock in the Theater Film Service Company and has acquired a one-half interest in the C. J. Hite Film Rental Company, the capital stock of which has been nearly doubled, and will be know hereafter as the H. & H. (Hutchinson & Hite) Film Service Company.

Mr. Hutchinson is the son of a banker. He acquired his early business education in his father's bank, and later held a responsible position with one of the big Chicago banks. His training in the banking business has especially fitted him for making a success of any line where accuracy and capacity to handle details is necessary.

Mr. C. J. Hite is a well known man in amusement enterprises and for several years successfully conducted a lyceum for motion picture and lecture entertainments here in Chicago. The C. J. Hite enterprises covered, among other things, complete motion picture services for prominent social assemblys and were booked solid with the well-known Chautauqua organizations represented everywhere in the United States. In February, 1908, seeing the possibilities in the film renting field, Mr. Hite organized and incorporated the C. J. Hite Film Company which, through his ample management and untiring energy, became one of the most progressive film exchanges in the country. When the big raiding of the Patents Co. occurred last December, the C. J. Hite Film Company was one of the very few who got a license. The C. J. Hite Film Company has, three times in a very short while, been compelled to seek larger headquarters to be able to meet the demands of a tremendous growing business. The firm occupies now an elaborate suite of offices, third floor, Monadnock Block. It's the policy of the H. & H. Film Service Company to be strictly up to date in every regard, and among other changes they will equip their offices with new furniture and other up-to-date conveniences. A conspicuous feature of the new equipment will be a new office system which, we are told, will include all the best points of other systems in use, and with the new facilities, increased capital, increased buying of the best films and the combined able management of Messrs. Hutchinson and Hite, it is expected that the H. & H. Film Service Company will be a model for the excellence of their service.

MOVING PICTURES IN THE HOME.

At the request of many readers who were attracted by our suggestion that small moving picture cameras for home and amateur use would probably find a ready sale, we append particulars of one of them, the Kino, which is marketed by Burke & James, Chicago.

The Kino is the invention of the German camera manufacturer, Heinrich Ernemann, of Dresden. It is no larger than a small hand camera and requires no more skill in its operation than the ordinary camera.

The camera not only takes the negative, but prints the positive and finally projects it. The magazine which automatically revolves the film to the field of the lens is instantly attached or detached from the back of the camera in daylight. The camera contains the mechanism which regulates the film and is also fitted with view finder, revolving shutter and anastigmat lens working at f-2. The revolving shutter consists of two discs with sections cut out which can be adjusted to give any width of slot and which practically constitute a focal plane shutter. The operation from the loading of the unexposed film to the projection of the positives on the screen is simple. The unexposed film is placed over a spindle inside of the magazine, the end is attached to a spool which is a part of a small clockwork mechanism. The film is perforated and when the magazine is attached to the camera the holes engage in the teeth of a sprocket wheel. During exposure the mechanism is operated by means of the small crank handle which revolves the shutter in unison with the sprocket wheel.

ESSANAY EXPANDS.

Extensive alterations in the main offices of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, at 62 North Clark street, Chicago, are now under way and employees of this enterprising moving picture firm will soon have the most commodious and up-to-date working quarters ever to be desired.

With the completion of the new factory at 1055 Argyle street, the old studio was abandoned and the much needed space it formerly occupied is being remodeled and furnished with elaborate office fixtures. This fills a long felt want with their extensive and ever increasing business.

The work at the new studios is now running smoothly and is a decided success, as the photographic excellence and general superiority of their recent pictures plainly attest.

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS ASSOCIATION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Secretary's Office, 3954 Market Street.

Philadelphia, July, 1909.

Mr. Exhibitor:

For a period of time, our industry was in a most flourishing condition, but owing to a combination of interests, antagonistic to our cause and because of adverse legislation, some of which is obnoxious, we have arrived at a point where we must sink or swim.

Those who are responsible for this movement, to protect the exhibitors from within as well as from without, are men of large interests some of whom have invested thousands of dollars to erect handsome theaters. They had so much faith in the business that they have risked everything in many cases. Perhaps you are one of that number. Are you going to sit idly by and see your efforts wiped out? You say NO; of course. Then lend us your support.

We want every proprietor of a motion picture theater of respectability and honesty of purpose to join our Association. Don't say like many have done, "Well, I'll go in just to be identified." Don't think because you may be willing to pay dues or assessments you will be considered a good member. Not so, we want your individual assistance and co-operation. We must have it in order to be successful.

To be eligible for membership, he or they must pledge him or themselves to avide by a majority vote of its members and not to permit personal spite to guide his or their actions. We want unity of action and while in union there is strength, we do not propose to sacrifice our prestige merely to make our Association strong numerically. We believe that if we organize the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Pennsylvania and conduct same as above specified, we can make ourselves a power in the industry and when the test comes and come it must, they, the legislators and all others who attempt to curtail our privileges, will have us to reckon with.

We are not antagonistic to any person or persons, or to any body or organization. We have banded together for mutual protection. The law lately passed by the Legislature governing motion picture theaters in cities other than the first and second class is unreasonable. The contemplated legislation relative to additional license fees is likewise an imposition and if we do not rise and prove to the community at large that we are being trodden on, there will be nothing for us to do but shut up shop. This would be suicidal. WAKE UP. Address an individual letter of protest to your respective legislators and prove to them how, by their recent vote, they have deprived you of an honorable means of livelihood and their constituents in general of a moderate priced amusement, moral, clean and uplifting, where one's wife and children may attend with perfect safety.

NOW is the time to act. NOT to-morrow or next week. A meeting to which you are cordially invited will, therefore, be held on Wednesday, July 28, 1909, at 2 o'clock P. M., at Odd Fellows Temple, Room C, 7th floor, Broad and Cherry streets, Philadelphia.

At this meeting, a committee will be appointed to draft a set of By-Laws and Regulations to govern the body and if you have views that will aid us, by all means present them. Please signify your intention to be present, by return mail, to the Secretary's office, and DON'T FAIL TO COME.

Cordially yours,

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS ASSOCIATION OF PENNSYLVANIA,

CHARLES SEGALL, Chairman, 608-14 South street, Philadelphia.

OTTO MILLER, Secretary, 3954 Market street, Philadelphia.

"JACK" BINNS SUES VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

"Jack" Binns, the hero of the wreck of the Republic, whose wireless "C. Q. D." rescued hundreds of passengers, has brought a suit for $25,000 damages against the Vitagraph Company of America. Binns asks that the company be restrained from exhibiting moving pictures purporting to be likenesses of himself on "Saved by Wireless" films. The hearing is set for next Monday before Justice Bischoff in the Supreme Court.

Binns avers he was the first wireless telegraph operator who succeeded in calling aid to a sinking ship at sea.

The petitioner alleges the moving pictures are misrepresentative of the actual scene on the wreck, and that they make him ridiculous. He petitions the court to order that all films showing pictures of himself shall be turned over to him.

WESTERN EXCHANGE MEN TO MEET.

Motion Picture Men Called for Conference.

An invitation has been extended by Melvin G. Winstock, general manager of the Morton Film Exchange, of this city, to the general managers of all the film exchanges as well as motion picture exhibitors who are operating in this territory, to meet at Portland, Ore., on or about August 1, for the purpose of considering the general situation concerning motion picture theaters in the Northwest. It is expected there will be present on that occasion representatives of the Edison Display Company, of Seattle; the Montana Film Exchange, of Butte; Trent & Wilson, of Salt Lake City; the Spokane Film Renting Company, of Spokane, and all others who are interested in this particular industry. At this conference it is expected some very important matters will be considered.

In answer to an inquiry as to the general status of the motion picture business in this section of the country, Mr. Winstock said: "Matters have progressed very satisfactorily since the organization of the Motion Picture Patents Company, in which the leading manufacturers of the United States and foreign countries are interested. The process of amalgamation and consolidation has been applied to the motion picture business, with the result that a very much better class of pictures is being turned out by the factories and productions have been limited so as to produce the best results. It was asserted in the beginning that there would be a general line of attack made on this consolidation, but thus far the so-called independents have been practically driven out of the field wherever they have attempted to fight the consolidation, and the result is that most of the exhibitors—that is, 95 per cent. of them—are taking their service from the licensed exchanges.

"I believe that the motion picture theater is but in its infancy," said Mr. Winstock, "but that the tendency will be greatly toward the larger and more thoroughly equipped theater, and I believe that as time rolls on this particular branch of public amusement will extend and develop for the reason that there is nothing in science, art, the drama or education, which cannot be reproduced in the form of a motion picture and presented for public purposes at a price which is within the reach of the humblest seeker of amusements.

"As a matter of fact, within the last year the most intelligent people in the community have begun to realize the importance of the motion picture, and they are as regular in their attendance upon this form of amusement as at the opera or the regular so-called legitimate drama. The great producers in the consolidation have realized that the public demands only that which is excellent, and they are now paying the highest salaries to the best actors they can procure in the world to pose for these moving pictures. It is stated on good authority that some of these pictures in their original production cost as high as $50,000. As long as the public can see things of this kind in a neat and comfortable theater at a trifling expense, so long will the motion picture continue in successful operation."

THIS LOOKS LIKE PERSECUTION.

Mr. Samuel Bergofler, of the Star Moving Picture Theater, 483 Third avenue, New York City, is held in $500 bail for the Court of General Session, for exhibiting the two films, "Miss Sherlock Holmes" and "The Road Agents." These films are now running in other New York and Brooklyn theaters and all over the country and never a word has been heard in disapproval, in fact we are informed that a police officer who witnessed a show in Brooklyn in which these films formed a part of the programme, said that it was the best show he had seen for some time. Therefore, when an arrest is made on such a threadbare excuse, we must look for some ulterior motive.

INDEPENDENT N. I. FILM.

We are informed that the Great Northern Film Company are now issuing about 40 per cent. of their output on Eastman non-inflammable film and that in a short time that stock will be used altogether. When all the independent manufacturers, as well as the licensed manufacturers, issue nothing but non-inflammable film the trade will be relieved of much of the hardships from which it now suffers and the cause for such drastic ruling as is threatened by even the express companies will have ceased to exist.

TONING LANTERN SLIDES.

By John A. Hodges, F. R. P. S.

Although black may be regarded as the "standard" color for a lantern slide, its pictorial qualities may sometimes be greatly enhanced by a suitable modification or selection of color. There has long been a difference of opinion on this point, but it would seem undesirable to fetter the slide-maker in his endeavor to secure an artistic rendering of his subject by limiting him in his choice of color.

"Color" v. "Tone."

Photographers are prone to use the word "tone" when they intend to refer to the "color" of a lantern slide.

Many workers, in their anxiety to secure a particular effect, are often unmindful of the fact that the process selected may be one upon which reliance should not be placed.

The novice in slide-making should certainly learn to make a good black slide before attempting the production of color effects. It will here be assumed that the reader has succeeded in producing several black slides, the color of which he desires to modify by the subsequent process of toning.

Permanence.

It is desired, however, to preface these hints on "toning" by recording the opinion that permanence should be regarded as a sine qua non in any photographic process and, if possible, the remark applies with even greater force to a lantern slide than to a print, because the conditions to which the former are subjected are far more trying to its stability than those to which the latter is ordinarily exposed. Further, our experience has demonstrated that color, when produced by toning, is of a more fugutive character than when effected by direct development.

Gold Toning.

The black produced by simple development is sometimes of a rusty or greenish hue, and in such cases a short immersion in a gold toning bath will greatly improve the color. Some lantern plates, however, are more amenable to the action of the bath than others. The same formula and treatment may produce very dissimilar results with different brands of plates.

A stock solution of chloride of gold is prepared by dissolving the contents of a 15-grain tube of gold chloride in 15 drachms of distilled watter. The toning bath is made as follows:

Stock solution of gold	2 drachms.
Soda phosphate	30 grains.
Distilled water	1 ounce.

The time occupied in toning will vary with different makes of plates, as also will the effect produced. Sometimes the color will quickly change to a pure engraving black, no matter how "rusty" or impure it may have been in the first instance. If the action be continued further the color becomes purple, and, with some plates, gradually changes to a bluish purple, ultimately becoming a pure blue. There are some plates, however, that will not pass into the blue stage. Slides so treated, if properly washed at all stages, are likely to prove permanent. The above remarks apply to bromide, or bromochloride plates, called by the makers "cold" and "warm toned" respectively.

Chloride Plates.

These tone very easily and pass quickly to the purple stage, so that the action of the bath must be carefully watched, not by looking at the slide as it lies in the dish, but by constantly examining it by transmitted light. The change of color will be more easily observed by holding the slide in front of a piece of ground glass held up against the source of light.

For chloride plates the following toning bath is most suitable:

Ammonium sulphocyanide	30 grains.
Stock gold solution	3 drachms.
Distilled water	1 ounce.

Very varied and sometimes beautiful color effects may be obtained by first bleaching the slide with mercury, thoroughly washing, and then immersing in a plain aqueous solution of gold. The toning action in this case is slow, in some cases occupying hours, but the action may be accelerted by raising the temperature of the gold bath to 80° or 90°. Slides so produced, however, are liable to deteriorate with age. The gold bath is made by taking

Stock gold solution	2 drachms.
Distilled water	1 ounce.

Platinum Toning.

Slides may be treated with the following platinum toning bath in the same manner as with gold:

Platinum chloroplatinite	2 grains.
Distilled water	1 ounce.
Nitric acid	1 minim.

But the toning action is not so satisfactory, being irregular, and with some plates proceeding with difficulty, nor can warmth of color be readily obtained. Mr. Somerville's platinum and mercury method produces fine warm browns by reflected light, but it is difficult to carry the reactiton sufficiently far to obtain the same color effect by transmitted light, nearly all toning action being in its nature superficial or partial, and hence the variation of the results so obtained.

Uranium Toning.

Various shades of brown and red can be easily produced by toning with uranium.

No. 1.

Potassium ferricyanide	40 grains.
Acetic acid	3 drachms.
Distilled water	10 ounces.

No. 2.

Nitrate of uranium	40 grains.
Acetic acid	3 drachms.
Distilled water	5 ounces.

The slides to be toned by this process, or indeed by any other, must be thoroughly washed to remove every trace of hypo, or reduction instead of toning will result. The above solutions should be mixed in equal parts just prior to use. When the desired color is obtained the slide must be washed in frequent changes of water slightly acidulated until the yellow tinge in its clear portions is removed. Prolonged washing will discharge the color and leave the slide in its original condition, the color being readily soluble in an alkaline solution. (N. B.—Most tap water is slightly alkaline.)

Blues and Greens.

Green and blue may be easily produced by first toning the black image to a brown by the foregoing uranium method, washing until the yellow stain is discharged, and then immersing the slide in the following:

Perchloride of iron (B.P)	10 minims.
Distilled water	1 ounce.

The color will slowly change, first to a yellowish and then to a bluish green, and, if the action be continued, to greenish blue, and ultimately to a bright Prussian blue, the color of the latter being made deeper by immersion in the following acid bath:

Sulphuric acid	10 minims.
Water	1 ounce.

Subsequently washing till the blue tinge in the lights is eliminated. The slides should not be washed in running water, nor should the washing be very prolonged, as the blue deposit, like the brown, is soluble in water. As the uranium bath has an intensifying action, and confers density on the slide, care must be taken in development to keep the slides thin.

Mercury Toning.

Many very beautiful shades of brown, red and purple are obtainable by first bleaching with mercury and then applying a reducing agent. For instance, ammonia or sulphite of soda gives fine purples and blacks, lime water or sulphide of soda beautiful browns.

Warm Tones by Development.

Warm tons produced by development give by far the most satisfactory results as regards permanence. The reason being that the color of the image is due to the condition in which it is deposited by the developer, whereas in most cases when the color is produced by toning, the chemical reaction is more or less superficial, and therefore incomplete and liable to future change.

The conditions which tend to warmth of color by direct development are generous exposure, greatly in excess of that required to produce black colored slides, followed by slow, or tentative, development with a weak and highly restrained developer. The longer the exposure the greater the warmth of color, but to produce it the developer must be diluted and further restrained, and a longer time allowed for development. Any attempt to curtail the period of development by the addition of accelerator will defeat the object aimed at, and cool the ultimate color of the slide.

Pyro Development.

Pyro is a suitable developer for the production of warm-colored lantern slides. The following formula is reliable:

No. 1.

Pyro	40 grains.
Sulphite of soda	200 grains.
Citric acid	20 grains.
Bromide of potassium	30 grains.
Distilled water	20 ounces.

No. 2.

Carbonate of ammonia	60 grains.
Sulphite of soda	100 grains.
Ammonia .880	1 drachm.
Distilled water	20 ounces.

For use, mix in equal parts just before use. It is unnecessary to dwell on the technical details of exposure and development, commercial plates varying so much in speed and other characteristics, but using the developer in the manner indicated a normal exposure should yield a slide of a good sepia brown. If greater warmth is desired the exposure must be increased, and the composition of the developer modified by adding one part of No. 2 solution to two parts of No. 1, and diluting the mixed developer by adding water equal to its bulk.

Developing Chloride Plates.

The warmest shades of color, i. e., yellows, claret color and bright red, are most easily obtained on chloride plates developed with the following developer:

No. 1.

Citric acid	130 grains.
Carbonate of ammonium	50 grains.
Distilled water	1 ounce.

No. 2.

Sulphate of iron	120 grains.
Sulphuric acid (pure)	2 minims.
Distilled water	1 ounce.

Give the plate a full exposure. Add one part of No. 2 to three parts of No. 1 just before use.—From The Practical Photographer.

"LET SLEEPING DOGS LIE."

Baton Rouge, La., July 20, 1909.

World Photographic Publishing Company,
New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen—I desire to say a few words in connection with the Kalem film entitled "The Escape from Andersonville," just now attracting considerable attention where shown in the South. The New Orleans Times-Democrat of yesterday contains on its front page a criticism of the film. It is attracting attention and will continue to do so as long as exhibited in the South, as it touches too close to old sores not yet entirely healed.

The Kalem people have been putting on Southern pictures which, while no doubt possessing many points of merit and which would no doubt take well in other sections of the country, are liable to call forth protests from those of the South who are still sensitive on matters pertaining to the Civil War.

There is an old maxim which bids us "let sleeping dogs lie" and any film likely to promote sectional prejudice is best kept north of the Mason & Dixon line and not allowed presentation in the South. No matter how historically correct the story and the presentation may be there is always the danger of handling a burning question and it had better be eliminated altogether.

I would not take the responsibility of presenting this class of films to my patronage, and I cater almost exclusively to a population of over 25,000 people. I would recommend for the good of the business that all films containing the most remote insinuation and in the least manner calculated to provoke sectional sentiment, be scrupulously kept out of the section in which it is likely to prove objectionable.

The moving picture business is to be adapted to the likes and dislikes of the people to whom it caters if its ultimate success is desired and films like the one in question are sure to cause unpleasant publicity and untoward notoriety when exhibited in the sections which it is apt to misrepresent even though this alleged misrepresentation is gauged by the prejudiced standards of the community.

As stated above, I could not and would not use this class of films with my audiences, and would recommend that the less reference made to the Civil War the better success the motion picture business will have, especially with the Southern people.

Yours very truly,
ERNST BOEHRINGER.

APPRECIATION.

"Lux Graphicus":

Dear Sir—Being very largely interested in the Star Theater, of Tremont row, Boston, I am a constant reader of the only non-partisan paper dealing with the motion picture industry—the Moving Picture World. As I am away on my vacation, the edition of July 3d only reached me this evening. I am a great admirer of Biograph work—ergo, your article on "The Way of Man" was a delight for me to read. It is not every day that a man (?) is found who appreciates the fine points of their work as well as you do, and who can express his opinion as fluently as you did. You state that you "take off your hat" to the excellence of Biograph films. Allow me to do the same for you. Your article distinctly deserves it. For three years I have seen nearly every film released, and I still look forward to seeing Biograph work in the way I used to when a motion picture was a novelty. If the other trust manufacturers were of their standard the moving picture industry would proceed even faster than it does now. I agree with your article, word for word. I really believe that the two leading Biograph actresses and their leading actors are distinctly superior to many so-called "$2" artists I have seen on the legitimate stage. I am, Very truly yours,

A. H. ROSENBAUM,
Old Orchard House.

THIS LETTER WAS UNSIGNED.

Editor Moving Picture World, New York:

Dear Sir—Following up a suggestion made by a friend who was stung by The Dribben Publishing Co., of London, Ont., I will also say that I was a victim, too.

On the 20th of April I sent them $2 for their book entitled "Advertising Help for Moving Picture Theater Managers" and I never received a reply to my letter and failed to receive any information from the postal authorities.

I have written them three times since, and have received no replies to these letters.

Mr. Sherman Walker, of The Theatorium, Springfield, Ohio, advised me to take advantage of an offer you are making to anyone who had been a victim of their advertisements, and this letter is the result of his suggestion.

Hoping I am not taking advantage of the same at this late date, I remain, Very truly yours,

THE SLAVE.—The noble sacrifice of a devoted wife and mother. The pages of Roman history do not chronicle a more noble deed of self-sacrifice than that set forth in this Biograph story, which shows how a devoted Roman wife and mother went to the very extreme of mental, moral and manual endurance for the sake of her beloved ones. Nerada, a beautiful Roman girl, was much sought by lovers, among whom was Deletius, a wealthy patrician, but she clings to the white rose of purity, rejects the nobleman's gifts and proposals to accept one of her own honest caste, the poor young sculptor, Alachus, whom she marries. Some years later we visit the atelier of Alachus to find that bitter poverty is the lot of the little Roman family, now increased by a child, who is lying ill unto death. The poor sculptor enters, returning from a tiresome, fruitless journey trying to sell his statues, but the very gods seem to conspire, and he is now face to face with that wolverine specter, starvation. Footsore and weak from hunger he sinks down upon the couch fainting. Brave little Nerada, in sore distress, realizes that their life's blood is slowly but surely ebbing for want of nourishment. In desperation she decides to make the sacrifice, though appalling, odious and heart-breaking it may be, by going to the slave mart and being sold as a slave that the lives of her husband and child may be saved by the proceeds thereof. Meanwhile, during all these years, Deletius has suffered keenly, for he truly and honestly loved the girl Nerada, and since the time of her rejection of his love, which he then thought, like on many other occasions, was but a fleeting fancy, life was dull, he appears bored and annoyed. The fawning of his slaves and attendant seemed hollow mockery. Nothing seemed possible to lift him out of the slough of ennui, until his secretary conceived the idea of attending the slave mart in the hope of obtaining a new face that might interest him. Entering about the time the slave master puts Nerada on the stand, he is at once determined to procure the beautiful girl feeling sure that here is a means of dissipating the lethargy of his master, Deletius. After spirited bidding, Nerada is sold to the secretary, and is about to be taken to the palace of his master, when Alachus rushes in, having learned of his wife's action. But it is too late; she is another's by right of purchase, so he returns heart-broken to his studio to receive another and more severe blow—his child is dead. Assisted by his friend and neighbor he carries out the precious faded flower for burial. When Nerada is ushered into the presence of her new master, the amazement is mutual. Deletius, at first, is inclined to gloat, but when he hears the desperate, heart-rending appeal of the noble girl, he realizes what a precious jewel true, self-sacrificing love is, so the white rose of purity remains unsullied, and he decides to hand her back to her beloved ones. Repairing to the home of Alachus, what a pitiable scene greets them. Grief has shattered the reason of the poor sculptor, but at the sight of Nerada the veil of darkness slowly fades and the dawn appears.

A CONVICT'S SACRIFICE.—Proving that the noblest work of God is man. "He is noble only who in word, thought and deed, proves himself a man," and you will admit in viewing this Biograph subject that this poor unfortunate being was indeed a man in the extreme sense of the word. After serving a long time in the penitentiary he is released and sent out into the world again; but, like many others, with the brand of Cain still on him. With crushed spirit, bitter against the world he makes his way through the streets, apparently shunned by all; in fact a social leper. However, there is one man who befriends him, and uses his influence to have him employed as a laborer on street construction work. He now begins to feel that life is worth while, but the very next day fate's treachery demonstrates itself and hopes are blighted. It occurs in this way: He is forced, through no fault of his own, into a bitter quarrel with one of the workmen, and in self-protection lands a fatal blow with his fist, and he is again seen in the terrible grind of prison life. Clad in strips he toils at breaking stone, cuffed and dogged by despotic guards until his pentup fury at last bursts forth and he makes a dash for liberty. Crawling and creeping like a serpent, and hunted like a rat, he finally comes upon a scarecrow in the field and dons the tattered garments in lieu of his stripes. Thus garbed his flight is more promising, when he espies a notice of the reward of $100 for his capture. Tearing the odious announcement from the post, which action was observed by a country boy, he wanders on, only to find he is still pursued by the armed guards, who had been informed by the yokel. Rushing madly on he finally comes upon a dilapidated cottage, which he deems a rather safe haven. Entering, he is astounded to find that by a strange designing of fate it is the home of the one man who had been his friend when he was released from prison. Desperate poverty together with the illness of one of his children, has shrouded the poor home with sorrow. As the fugitive stands and views the woe stricken family his flinty heart softens. He remembers that the man was a friend indeed, when he himself was most in need. Here was his chance to reciprocate, and calling the guards who are lurking around outside forces the man to accept the reward for his capture. As he leaves the house the self-sacrificing convict falls a fatal victim to one of the vengeful guard's gun.

TAKING HIS PHOTOGRAPH.—Mr. Brown's most striking peculairity is his objection to being photographed.

Mr. B. had never been taken and vowed he never would.

Mrs. B. wanted his picture. Her coaxing him to visit the photographer, met with a flat refusal.

Her frank expressions concerning the absurdity of his attitude brought about a lively family discussion that resulted in her expressed determination to have him photographed by fair means or foul.

Mr. B. with some heat accepted the defy and went Mrs. Brown one better by offering to stake a new bonnet she would not get "it."

As a first trial she hired Levy, a tent photographer, who enters with zest into the game of stealing Brown's face. Friendly hands volunteer to place Brown in position. Just as success seems assured Brown realizes his position and his energetic efforts in getting away almost ruined Levy's stands and canvas.

A friend suggested her buying a Kodak as a possible means towards her end. In doing this, her efforts at amateur photography only succeed in spelling disaster to everybody and everything that happened in Brown's way of escape. Almost discouraged, Mrs. Brown was informed by a girl friend that a safe and sure way would be to have her husband arrested for crime and that the Police Department in its usual routine would get his picture. Although somewhat doubtful as to results, Mrs. B. enters into a plot against her husband. He is arrested charged with stealing the watch of his wife's friend.

After being duly photographed by the department he is brought up for examination. On resisting in the court room, he is removed as a dangerous character. The plotters, thinking the joke has reached high-water mark, disclose the circumstances to the judge, who appreciating the joke, releases the prisoner, gives Mrs. Brown an order for the precious pictures but still wonders at the ways of woman. Decidedly Mrs. B. won her hat. Length, 700 feet.

LOVE'S SACRIFICE.—The sacrifice Captain Tom made for the sake of the girl's happiness was the greatest a man can make for the woman he loves. Love that passeth all understanding was that which filled the old sailor's heart with fragrance and with sorrow. For years he had felt his affection for sweet Nell Connors pulsing within him, yet he seldom allowed an expression of it to escape him. The whole village knew he loved her, but few understood how much. Such love as his, so strong, so potent, is rare enough to be beyond almost anyone's ken.

She did not care for Tom, but she did love happy Jack Careless, the sailor to whom she plighted her troth just before he sailed away on a long voyage to the Indies. He was to have written often, but, alas, no letter came at all and her simple soul sank beneath a weight of woe. She knew nothing of Jack's shipwreck and the trials that beset him and meanwhile an event of great portent to her life occurred at home. Her father was saved from a watery grave by Captain Tom's strong arms and when Tom bashfully asked her to share his lot, believing that Jack had forgotten his love love for her, her father's voice was raised to give strength to the entreaty. She hesitated, but the pressure was too much and at last she responded in the affirmative.

The wedding day was set, the bells rang out, the bridal party started for the church when suddenly a shadow fell athwart Captain Tom's happiness. Jack, just returned, burst upon the scene. Captain Tom loved her too well to compel her promise to him. Jack took his place at the altar after the old sailor had made his renunciation for her sake. Oblivious of all else but their own happiness Nell and Jack sailed away on their honeymoon, old Captain Tom was blotted out of their lives, but he cherished his dead love in his bosom and felt the girl's happiness was compensation for what he had lost. Length, 520 feet.

MULLIGAN'S WATERLOO.—Tim Mulligan was not a member of the Mulligan Guards, probably he knew nothing whatever about them, but if he had he would readily have declared his ability to whip an entire company of any guards on earth. Nor would those who knew Mulligan and his physical prowess have doubted this assertion in the least.

Proud of his ability as a fighter Mulligan put himself to his severest tests on the day he met his Waterloo. Over their noon-day luncheon at the quarry three of his fellow laborers smiled at his tales of the combats he had waged. All three came to grief at the redoubtable Irishman's fists. In the evening he squelched the fighting ardor of as many men on the street corner. Attacked on a park road he sent a whole company of citizens and a policeman as well to the ground. Taking exception to some of the passengers in a trolley car he turned loose with his mighty right and chaos reigned in the public vehicle before he deigned to leave it. Verily, it was a field day for Mulligan, the brawny fighting man of the quarry force, and when he finally turned his belligerent countenance homeward his chest had increased several inches in girth and his fiery head was carried with a new pride in his own capabilities.

Small was the chance the rent collector and the policeman he found on his front porch, had at his hands, therefore, and glad were they to escape his telling blows; small would have seemed the chance of Mrs. Mulligan when she turned upon him for reviling the dinner she had prepared, but such, in this last instance, was not the case. Mulligan, the champion, met his Waterloo. For a few minutes he thought he was in the grasp of a combination typhoon, hurricane and cyclone and when Mrs. Mulligan finally ceased her massage of his form he was glad to sue for mercy and happy to eat whatever it pleased her to set before him. Length, 455 feet.

MOTHER GOOSE (A Children's Comedy).—Generation after generation has known and loved these fanciful rhymes for the little folk and like heads on a ribbon they are here strung together on a pretty little thread of a story. The hero is a little lad who has fallen asleep with the sound of the rhymes in his ear to the tune of his mother's voice.

When she leaves him, the book beside him falls to the floor and wonder of wonders! Mother Goose herself springs right from it. She touches the boy and invites him to journey with her through Mother Goose Land. His adventures there begin with a call upon that bewitching Mary who was so contrary, and there he sees Mary's garden flowers change right before his eyes into rows of smiling little damsels. But when he goes to shake hands with them—why they are not girls at all but funny little dwarfs or gnomes.

Next he visits that famous old woman who lived in a shoe and every child knows how many children she had. But no children have seen what happened to the old woman's landlord when he came to collect the rent for the shoe. A good fairy prevented his troubling the large family, by transforming him into thin air.

And Jack and Jill! Every child has heard of that roll down the hill but it is much better to have seen it and in the Edison showing of this story, it all happened just as it has been told.

The last visit is a very exciting one, for while the small boy is watching and about ready to make the acquaintance of Little Miss Muffit a very, very large spider of most ferocious aspect appears and not only frightens the little lady away but actually picks up the little boy, and starts with him for the tree far above their heads.

Very fortunately our small hero awakes just in time to be saved by his own little mother, who strangely enough didn't see the spider at all when she hears him call. Some people might think he dreamed the whole thing, but no real child would entertain such a thought. Length, 300 feet.

THE TRAMP'S STORY.—Joe Brown is a jovial, good natured blacksmith in a little town in the Lehigh Valley in New York, the beloved husband of a good wife and the father of a sweet-faced girl of sixteen. They are living happily together, and with careful savings and hard work he has bought a modest little home. Nellie, being the prettiest girl in all the valley, is courted by every farmer lad for miles around, but none of them seem to suit her, she declaring that no man in all New York is good enough for her.

Brown is busily at work at his forge one day when a young stranger, leading a horse, appears. The horse has lost a shoe and during the replacing of another Nellie appears on the scene. The young stranger is immediately smitten with the girl's winsome face and when she leaves he follows her. They meet later and he confesses his love for her. In the handsome young stranger Nellie at last finds her hero and after a short courtship, of which the girl does not inform her parents, he persuades her to elope with him. The next morning the father and mother discover the loss of their daughter; the mother becomes violently ill and her life is despaired of.

The little country girl goes to the city with the young man and after a month, in which she implores him to marry her, he leaves her for another woman. Nellie returns to her home, heart-broken and ill, and after confessing the unhappy ending of her romance, drops dead at her father's feet. The poor mother, frantic with shame and grief, survives her daughter by just a week or two and the poor, grief-stricken blacksmith, his home wrecked, his happiness destroyed, finds solace in drink.

In the hope of finding the scoundrel who betrayed his daughter he becomes a tramp and after several years' search encounters him in a barroom. Here the villain receives his just deserts, while the tramp leaves, happier for having obtained the longed for revenge and the fulfillment of his oath.

A CASE OF SELTZER.—A young dude insists upon mashing a girl who is passing and minding her own affairs. She turns him down coldly, but he still continues to shower his attentions upon her. Finally she breaks away from him and rushes to her home. Her brother and some of his friends are playing cards. She tells them of her episode, and they immediately devise a plan whereby they can give the flirt a lesson. One of the boys dresses in the girl's clothes, and the rest each take a seltzer bottle, and go to do damage to the young man's appearance.

He is still waiting when they come out, and the rescher thinks the boy dressed up is the girl. He

A CONVICT'S SACRIFICE

Embittered Against the World, Yet a Man.

This subject proves that the noblest work of God is man. Here we find a poor unfortunate, who, having served a long term in prison, is released to find the world against him. But there is one man who befriends him and gets him employment. Fate, however, conspires, and he, through no fault of his own, is landed back in the terrible grind of prison life. The despotism of the guards, with renewed force, impels him to break for liberty, and in his flight he comes upon the one man who had been his friend. Fortune has frowned upon this man, who with poverty and illness faces starvation. The convict remembers, and forces the friend to accept the reward for his capture.

THE SLAVE

Noble Sacrifice of a Devoted Wife and Mother.

A most beautiful subject of the Romanesque type, comprising a series of intensely dramatic and touching scenes. It tells of a Roman girl's rejection of a rich nobleman's suit in preference to the love of a poor sculptor, whom she marries. Ill-luck is their lot, and years later we find them reduced to want, with a sick child added to their woe. The noble girl decides upon self-sacrifice, selling herself at the slave mart for that which may sustain her beloved ones. By strange fortuity she is bought by the attendant of the nobleman, who is at first elated, but learning of her sublime motive, sends her back to her home unsullied, where, upon returning, she finds the child has died. But then the pure, innocent spirit has simply gone before to dispel the darkness and bring the dawn.

immediately pounces upon her and endeavors to force his attentions upon her.

The boys with the seltzer bottles now rush upon the scene while the man in feminine attire belabors the wouldbe masher with a parasol.

The masher gets all that is coming to him, and the boys turn homeward much elated over the severe lesson they have administered to the impudent young man.

GAUMONT.

(George Kleine)

THE LAST CONFESSION.—The infant son of a town magistrate is given into the care of the nurse. Shortly after the child dies and the nurse substitutes her own child, which in due time is returned to the unsuspecting parents. The young fellow is reared under most favorable conditions but develops a failure. He is an ardent participant of the gaming table and there commits acts which reflect upon the honor of his family. The father presents him with a weapon and counsels vindicating his honor. At this time a letter is received from the nurse in which she confesses the death of the magistrate's son and the substitution of her own. The magistrate feels that no taint remains on his honor and bids the young man to seek his dying parent. The young man, dumbfounded by a realization of the facts, hastens to the home of his parents, but arrives there too late to greet his mother. Length, 837 feet.

PAPA'S HAT.—Entering the drawing room a little girl notices her papa's new hat, which proves to be an opera hat. She picks up the hat and becomes greatly excited when she unconsciously opens it. Shyly she approaches the hat for a second time and the performance is repeated. In order to accentuate the tremendous consternation of the girl she dissolves into an interrogation point while the mystifying hat opens and closes itself. Length, 140 feet.

IN HOT WATER.—During the absence of madame the housemaid receives her gentlemen friend, a draper's delivery man, and entertains him in the kitchen. Unhappily for the lovers the mistress returns unexpectedly.

The caller hides himself in the wash boiler and when the madame enters she starts the fire under the boiler, thus liquifying the unfortunate lover. The maid conceives the idea of restoring her sweetheart to life by placing the latter's uniform under the cold water faucet in the sink. Her hopes are realized but the kitchen is flooded. The water rises to such an extent that the floor gives way and the mass is precipitated into the flat below. At every succeeding story the same occurrence takes place, thus converting the building into a veritable waterfalls. Bound to create thunderous applause. Length, 447 feet.

AN EASY JOB.—In crossing the street the lady's heel is caught in the rail and all efforts on the part of her husband and others to extricate the foot are unavailing.

Traffic is blocked and the engineering corps is called into service. The rails are taken up, when a shoe salesman advises removing the lady's shoe, which is done and then the salesman gets in his work and sells her another pair of shoes. Length, 467 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine.)

HIS RIVAL'S HAND.—Experiences of a young artist who chooses a wife against the wishes of his father. The elopement, scenes at the gaming tables, where the young man falls into the clutches of a money lender, who is an unsuspected rival, the timely parental interference and indulgence, are all set forth in thrilling sequence. Extremely fascinating throughout. Length, 617 feet.

PARKS IN BERLIN.—A subject of great beauty and charm, perfectly photographed. Lovely light and shade effects on the various picturesque lakes. Other views include: The Brandenberg Tor with its marble fountains in full display—The morning's ride; taking the hurdles—The Siegesallee; an avenue of Statues (a donation of the Emperor to the city) representing the respective rulers of Germany from an early period—German nurses and their charges—Feeding swans—Children playing; amusing—The new and elaborate bridge of Charlottenberg. Length, 357 feet.

KALEM MFG. CO.

THE FACTORY GIRL depicts life among the humble mill workers of New England. It tells of a struggle between human passion, scheming ambition and innocent love and of love's final triumphant victory. All the scenes are laid in and about the little village which, in the course of years, has sprung up around the cotton mills that furnish a means of livelihood to most of the villagers.

Scene I.—Mabel and Her Old Father—The Factory Workers.

Scene II.—The Foreman Annoys Mabel.—It is 7 o'clock in the morning. The last whistle has just blown and in a few moments the silent mill will awaken with the roar of many whirling looms not to cease its noise until the final 6 o'clock whistle releases its tired workers from their day's labor. Outside the entrance to one of the loom rooms stands the foreman checking off the workers as they arrive. Here they come, boys and girls, young and old, all prepared for a hard and strenuous day's work. Here comes the old father. He greets the foreman. Last of all comes Mable, for she hates to go from the bright Spring sunshine into the stuffy loom room. The foreman follows her with greedy eye. He calls her back and attempts to arrange a meeting. She indignantly repulses him and enters the door. The foreman turns with a muttered curse. The mill owner and his son drive up and after passing a word of greeting to the foreman enter the mill. The foreman, left alone, stands scowling over the repulse he has received.

Scene III.—Ned, the Mill Owner's Son, and His Scheming Cousin.—Out on the lawn of his home we find the mill owner enjoying the delightful weather. A glance at his watch reminds him of a forgotten business engagement and he calls for his coat and hat. It is brought by his niece, a member of the household. A woman of unlimited ambition from the day she first entered his family, she has been scheming to marry Ned, his son, and thus enjoy his wealth.

Scene IV.—Noon Hour at the Mill—The Insult—Ned Interferes.—It is noon hour at the mill. Mabel in her desire to escape from the noise of the mill has taken her lunch basket to a quiet little nook in the woods behind the mill. Seating herself on an old log she carefully spreads out her lunch and opening her book prepares to enjoy a few of its fascinating pages. Through the bushes comes the foreman. He has not forgotten her repulse of his advances and observing her habit of coming to this secluded spot has followed her here. He creeps to her and has his arms around her before she is aware of his presence. Exerting all her strength she manages to escape for a moment. The foreman seizes her again while she screams with fright. But help is at hand. Ned, the mill owner's son, has heard her cry and rushes up. Without a moment's hesitation he seizes the cowardly foreman and hurls him into the bushes.

Scene V.—The Mill Owner's Son Falls in Love With Mabel the Mill Girl.

Scene VI.—Ned's Cousin Puts Up a Plot With the Foreman.

Scene VII.—They Steal Mabel's Dress to Get Her in Trouble.

Scene VIII.—The Plotter's at Work.—And now the foreman has succeeded in arranging matters so that his part of the plot will be successful. In front of one of his several plants we find the mill owner's horse and buggy waiting. Out of the office comes his cashier with a bag containing money for the weekly pay roll at the mills and with him is the foreman. The mill owner cautions them to be careful and after assuring him all will be safe they drive away, the bag containing the money safely beneath their feet. Now we see them coming along the road and across the bridge that spans the little stream which furnishes the mills with water. The cashier is urging the horse forward for he is anxious to arrive at the mill and turn the money over to the paymaster.

Scene IX.—The Robbery.

Scene X.—Mabel, Falsely Accused, Jumps Into the Pond and is Rescued by Ned. The Plotters Foiled.—The next day Mabel unconscious of all that has happened is idly fishing in the little stream near their cottage. Up behind her comes Ned for he knows she is waiting for him. After an affectionate greeting they begin planning their future. Suddenly on the bank back of them appears the cashier, the foreman and the sheriff. The cashier points out Mabel and tells the sheriff there is the thief. Crazed for the moment by the astounding accusation, Mabel rushes past them and leapes into the stream. Scarcely has she sunk below the surface before Ned, knowing the treacherous nature of the waters and that Mabel cannot swim, leaps in after her. In a moment he is beside her and soon brings her safely to the shore. Just as they are lifting her from the water her old father arrives with the mill owner and dragging between them the wretched niece. The old father after recovering from the blow she gave him has gone to the mill owner with the story. A fellow in the crowd becomes curious and when left alone starts to investigate the ponderous looking outfit. To his amazement, he discovers that all of the heavy weights are made of rubber. Having a keen sense of business, he picks up the stuff and starts down the street where he collects a large crowd who intently watch him give a performance in lifting the supposed heavy weights. THE BARBER'S REVENGE.—The opening scene of this amusing comedy shows us the interior of a long haired musician's home, where he passively sits playing his favorite selections on the 'cello for the amusement of his loving wife. All at once he realizes that he is badly in need of a shave, so after putting the instrument away, he takes his departure and starts for the tonsorial parlors. Arriving at his destination he gets ready for the operation but just as he is about to take his place in the chair, the barber is suddenly called away, leaving the shop in charge of his attractive wife. The gay musician having a keen eye for beauty casts a few devilish glances at the demure creature and in a little while he inveigles her into a rather risky flirtation. The happy pair are having a delightful time when in walks the barber, and there to his horror catches the musician embracing his wife. After upbraiding the woman in no mild manner, the indignant barber orders her out of the place, after which he sets to work to fix up his rival. He smears the frightened fellow with the lather, and the latter not daring to remonstrate, is compelled to sit in the chair while his enraged captor cuts off half of his mustache and large patches of his very aesthetic tresses, leaving him looking like a fit subject for a menagerie. The barber feeling that he has had his revenge leaves the place, and the woman again appears upon the scene and aids the poor musician in completing his toilet. She cuts off the rest of his hair and makes his head look like a billiard ball, after which he shaves off the remaining half of his mustache. His appearance is so changed that when he arrives home he is not recognized by his own wife, whom he finds embracing a cousin who has just arrived. Not knowing the country cousin, the enraged musician puts up a fight but is thrown bodily out of the place. Going to an adjoining room he takes the 'cello, and starts to play his wife's favorite tune, and recognizing the familiar air she at once realizes that the strange looking creature is really her husband. He is again admitted to the room and duly presented to his new cousin. As he continues playing upon the 'cello his amused wife places a laurel wreath upon his head crowning him the "king of fools." Length, 581 feet.

A MOTHER'S SORROW.—A young peasant is attending to his duties around the barn yard, when his sweetheart appears upon the scene, and being desperately in love with the maiden, the youth joyfully presents her to his old mother as his future wife. The old lady gives her consent and showers blessings upon the happy young people, never dreaming, however, that the step means the turning point in her son's life, as well as her own ruin. The young lovers meet many times, but the girl being an impulsive creature she has numerous quarrels with her admirer which causes him no end of trouble. She even demands money of him, and he, too weak to resist her appeals, goes and takes the last cent from his old mother to give to the thankless adventuress. One day he comes upon her in the company of another man, who is making love to her and in a terrible rage he denounces the faithless Miss, and swears vengeance upon his rival. The girl coolly informs him that if he wishes to hold her love, he must present her with a large amount of money, otherwise she will leave him and marry the other man who is very rich. Bound that he will have her at any cost the lovelorn youth makes out a note, stating, "I authorize my son to sell my property." Going then to his old mother he forces her to place her signature upon the paper. The old woman tries to reason with the boy, but he threatens suicide unless she complies with his wishes, so the poor old woman yields and puts her name on the slip. The cruel son then goes to a neighbor and is successful in disposing of the farm, receiving a large sum of money for same. Going then to his lady love he presents her with the ill gotten coin, which satisfies the avaricious creature who promises to become his wife.

The purchaser of the old homestead comes one day and turns the helpless old woman out of her old home. Broken hearted she takes her few little trinkets and starts out to face the world alone and friendless. As she is trudging along the road footsore and weary, her cowardly son is seen with his selfish companion enjoying a sail on the river. The boat makes a landing near the spot where the old woman has just fallen exhausted and hungry. As the couple come up, the young man recognizes his mother, and suddenly realizing the extent of his folly, he becomes desperately remorseful, and repudiates the woman who has been the cause of all the trouble, vowing never to see her again. It is too late to repair the terrible injury, already done, and the sorrowful mother dies in her repentant son's arms. Length, 679 feet.

CHARITY BEGINS AT HOME.—A young man who is entirely cleaned out of funds comes to his rich old uncle to make a gentle "touch," but the latter who has reached his limit of patience absolutely refuses to give the young squanderer a cent. The old fellow even goes so far as to inform the youth that he has made a will, cutting the latter off without a penny. Going to his safe the old man produces the document, and there to his great amazement the young man reads that all the fortune is to be distributed among the poor. The young fellow thinks of a great scheme whereby he will give the old man his fill of the poor and needy, so starting out from the house, he goes down the street and posts up a sign, upon which is written, "All those who need assistance, come to my house," and signs the rich old fellow's name. Immediately there is a scramble for the philanthroper's mansion and all sorts of beggars and tramps seek the haven of good cheer. When the old man comes in he is at a loss to know the nature of the grotesque gathering, but when he is told of the sign on the street, he makes the most of the situation and lets the motley crowd make themselves at home. After a short time he feels that he has reached the limit of his patience, so calls upon his nephew to help him out of the embarrassing position. The young man puts it up to the old fellow, and convinces him that he will only be throwing all of his money away by leaving it to such a bunch. The old fellow promises his nephew that if he will rid the place of all the pests, the money will all be his. The latter makes short work of the mob, and soon the place is cleared, after which the old fellow tears up the will and bands over the cold cash to the happy young sport. Length, 298 feet.

THE GAMEKEEPER'S SON.—Bob, the eldest son of a gamekeeper on a large estate sends the old folks a note in which he announces that he has just been raised to the office of Lieutenant in the army and is coming home on a furlough. He arrives and while his good parents are admiring his uniform, his little brother Jack, a mischievous youngster, who has been setting snares in the preserves, makes a bolt into the house and hides a brace of partridge in the old clock. The youngster who was surprised in his trapping by the master of the estate and his daughter is followed to the house by them where they come to complain of the lack of vigilance on the part of the gamekeeper, although they did not recognize the real culprit. When the Earl and his daughter enter the house, Bob is greatly surprised to see the young lady, for in their childhood days they were lovers, but their social distinctions are so wide apart that the young man has little hope of ever winning the fair maiden. His love of former days is revived, however, and the young couple exchange glances which mean more than tongue can tell. As the girl is about to depart with her father she accidently drops her gloves, and shortly after her departure Bob picks them up. That night when all is still he steals out of the house and starts for the mansion to return the gloves to their owner, and shortly after leaving he is followed by his father who sees the footprints in the snow while searching for the poachers. The young man gets to the window of the maiden's room and she hearing him outside quietly opens the shutters and allows him to climb in, for he realizes that he is being followed by his father and the Earl. At an opportune time the young officer leaves the girl and starts back to his home, but the gamekeeper and his employer, knowing that some one has been prowling around are hiding in a break in the wall. As the youth passes, the Earl fires but luckily misses, and the young man flees to his home closely followed by his pursuers. When he enters the house exhausted Jack realizes at a glance what a precarious position his brother is in, and in order to save the latter from disgrace, the youngster shoulders all the blame. The old gamekeeper and the Earl holt into the house and there find the youngster with the goods, and after a good reprimand the old Earl feels satisfied that he has put a stop to the trouble so returns home, while the father and his two sons congratulate each other over the lucky ending of the affair. Length, 702 feet.

himself and his young wife. But the fates seemed against him, and outside of a few odd jobs he was unsuccessful. To add to his burden and worry, his wife fell ill and was obliged to take her bed. The few dollars he had been able to save rapidly disappeared, and, as she was too ill to be left alone, Tom found it almost impossible to absent himself long enough to seek for work. The opening scene of the picture shows a plain but neat bedroom in a cheap lodging house. Tom is sitting by the bedside of his sick wife, waiting anxiously for the arrival of the doctor, who had promised to come and minister to his loved one's needs. A knock is heard at the door, but on opening it, instead of seeing the doctor, the sour face of his landlady greets his eye. Brushing past him into the room, she demands in a loud voice to know whether or not he was in a position to make her an immediate payment on his rent. Telling her that he had not a cent at present, he turns to pacify her with the promise to raise some money as soon as his wife is well enough to be left alone. That does not satisfy the irresistible landlady, and she gives him twenty-four hours to vacate the premises, and the same time placing a "To Rent" sign in the bedroom window while she is venting her anger in loud terms. The doctor arrives, and, taking in the situation at a glance, tells Tom to get rid of her, as her presence was trying to the invalid's nerves. She is finally ejected from the room, and the doctor, after examining the sick wife, writers out a perscription and tells Tom to have it filled immediately. Fearing to confess his inability to pay for the medicine, the poor fellow rushes out, determined to find some way by which he might make the necessary raise. Meeting a neighbor (Miss Maggie Clancy) on his way out, he asks her to remain with his wife until he can return. The good-hearted girl promises not to leave her alone, and so Tom starts out on his mission. We next see him at a drug store, where he accosts the druggist in the hopes of obtaining credit for a few days. But that gentleman is hardened by many similar requests and so turns a deaf ear to the anxious husband. From one to another the poor fellow goes, but always the same answer—"nothing doing." At last, worn out and discouraged, we see him enter the city park, where with a heart-broken sob he flings himself down on a garden bench and gives way to his grief. Coming through the park with rapid strides, whistling the last popular air, is Tim Bradley, a race tout. Tim also has been unfortunate lately in picking winners at the track, consequently is, as he expresses it, "on the blink" himself. Now, Tim had known Tom in his prosperous days, and the operator had staked him to many a meal when he was in sore need. The tout never forgot a favor, and seeing his old friend in seeming distress, asks what the trouble is, and Tom is not long in informing him. Diving into his pockets, he finds them empty. But Tim is nothing if not optimistic, and telling Tom to come with him, starts out determined to raise the money. He is not long in forming a plan, which his fertile brain rapidly conceives. He will work a stunt that is risky, but apt to succeed, and, being a chance his gaining instincts make it relishable. Hastening down an alley the two soon come to a back yard. A large washing is hanging out. Over the fence goes Tim, procures one of the clothes lines, and, returning, began to fashion a hangman' snoose on one end of it. Then back to the park, where a suitable tree is found, a bench is procured and placed beneath an overhanging limb. With instructions for Tom to make a round-about detour of the park, and at a certain signal attract attention to him, the tout proceeds to arrange for a fake attempt at suicide. The plan works beautifully. People walking along enjoying the flowers and sunshine are suddenly startled by a cry of "Look, there is a man hanging himself!" In an instant a great commotion arises. Men rush wildly toward the tree where the tout is preparing to spring into space with the end of a rope about his neck. Tom is in the lead and arrives just in time to catch Tim in his arms as he leaves the bench. The rope is cut and the struggling tout finally subdued. "Why did you do this?" blurts out an excitable old gentleman who has just rushed up out of breath. Then Tim, with tears in his eyes and a broken voice, relates a tale of woe about a sick wife and starving children that melts the hearts of the bystanders and causes a sudden diving for handkerchiefs and pocketbooks. Tom is dumbfounded at the acting of the clever tout and can hardly keep a straight face as he sees its effect on the crowd. "There, my poor man, take that," says the blubbering old gentleman as he drops a dollar into his hat and passes it around for further contributions. Many of the bystanders follow the old gentleman's example with the result that a goodly sum is turned over to Tim, and he is sent away stammering out his thanks to the kind hearts that have helped him so generously. "You are a brick, Tim," cries the grateful Tom as the tout hands him a handful of money when they are out of sight of the still excited crowd. "That's all right, old fellow, you have helped me many a time when I needed it. Take it home, give it to the little woman, then come with me to the track and we will see if we can't pick up some more." The medicine is quickly procured, and, kissing his fond wife good-bye for a few hours, leaves her in charge of the good-hearted neighbor and accompanies Tim out to the race track. After paying their admission the two boys have very little left as most of the money was turned over to the sick wife. But the tout was resourceful, as most men who live by their wits are, and not easily discouraged. So he sets out to see what he can learn about the horses and peddle his information to whoever he could. He was not long in spotting John McGee, the owner of a string of thoroughbreds and a clever plunger. Unknown to him, Tim follows him about the stables till finally he sees him stop, and pulling a telegraph blank from his pocket, begins to write a message. It doesn't suit him, so tearing it up he walks away. Tim watches him out of sight, then procures the torn pieces of the dispatch and, putting them together reads it. "To-day Fay, a 50-to-1 shot, looks good to me," signed Jack. That was enough for Tim. Now, then, to raise some money. A farmer standing near by looking at some of the racing stock attracts the tout's attention, and straightway for Ruben makes the irrepresible Tim. At first the farmer is suspicious of being done, but so convincing is Tim's argument, and so tempting is the chance to make a winning, that the bucolic gentleman loosens up for a twenty, and away goes the tout for the betting ring, where the bill is placed on "Lady Fay" with odds of 50 to 1. At last the eventful race is run, and the little mare gallops home a winner by a length. "Jumping beeswax!" shouts the excited farmer as Tim thrusts $500.00 into his hands (being one-half of the amount the clever tout drew from the chagrined bookmaker). "Never knew there was so much money in the world." Dividing his share with Tom, the two boys hasten back to the sick wife to bear her the cheering news of their good fortune. The landlady receives her rent. Maggie Clancy decides she needs a husband and picks Tim as the favorite, and the characters of our drama are left rejoicing over their unexpected turn of luck, which all goes to show that much good may be found "In the Heart of a Race Tout."

He listens to her story, takes her home with him and resolves to adopt her to take the place of the child he lost. eventful day we find coons of all siesz and colors hanging about waiting for the bridal party. The procession soon appears. The bride, a tall, angular woman, cannot enter the low doorway of her prospective husband's cabin, as the same has been fitted for the short, stubby owner. It is growing late and they are at a loss what to do, and do not wish to postpone the ceremony. Massa and missy appear at this critical moment and suggest that the ceremony take place on the lawn. The table is prepared, the happy couple are soon made one and the festivities begin. When the ceremony is taking place the groom sends a couple of men to cut away the door so that the bride can enter. Dancing and singing continue well into the night, the bride and groom are escorted to their cabin while the guests depart to their own homes. Length, 420 feet.

THE ARTIST'S REVENGE.—Raphael Perkins, a rather shabbily dressed artist, is seen at work in his studio, his actions betraying a feeling of despair and worry. His wife enters, tries to cheer him up, makes a proposition to which he emphatically shakes his head, then, reconsidering, takes a small picture from the wall and gives it to her. She kisses the artist good-bye, takes the picture to the office of Jacob Harris, an art dealer and money lender. Harris inspects the picture, his face lights up for a moment, then assumes a look of indifference. He shakes his head and hands the picture back. The poor woman, on the verge of tears, pleads with him and at last disposes of the picture for a five-pound note. After the woman has gone, Harris smiles to himself over the rare bargain, while the wife returns home and gives the money to her husband. Perkins is in a rage at the paltry price paid, denounces Harris in no uncertain terms and vows to get even if the opportunity is ever offered. A short time after Harris visits a rival art dealer, Moses Goldstein, where the two men are observed discussing business over their wine and cigars. Goldstein gets up and with a look of pride points to a full length portrait of himself which has just been finished. Harris admires it and determines to outdo his rival. Returning to his office he sends a note to Perkins asking him to paint a portrait of himself in character and naming the price of ten pounds. Perkins receives the letter and sees in it the chance he has longed for. He immediately accepts the offer on condition that payment for the same be made in advance. He sets about perfecting his arrangements and a little later Harris enters, and after a short talk pays over the money. The artist hands his victim the outfit of a Roman warrior, sandals, breast-plate, helmet, sword, etc., and bids him attire himself in an adjoining room. Harris is soon ready, is perched upon a platform in an awkward pose, while the artist apparently works rapidly, so fast in fact that he opens a window to cool himself. Harris, in his scanty clothes, is almost frozen and begs the artist to close the window. He also notices at this time that his clothes are missing and begs the artist to return them. He finally offers ten pounds, but Perkins demands double, which amount is finally given to him. Harris rushes behind the screen, puts on his street clothes, comes out quickly and is shown the artist's conception of himself—a life-sized picture of a jackass. The art dealers rushes home, where we find him endeavoring in various ways to ward of pneumonia, while Perkins and his wife repair to a swell restaurant and dine sumptuously with the "easy money." Length, 570 feet.

Fairfax secretes himself in a closet. Captain Blackford enters and mad with love for Marion, he embraces and kisses her despite her struggles to get away from him. Fairfax comes to the rescue of the girl he loves.

Blackford summons his soldiers who take Fairfax as a prisoner of war caught in the enemy's lines. Blackford then offers the terror stricken girl this proposition: if she will marry him he will permit Fairfax to escape; if Marion refuses, her lover will be shot as a spy. The Englishman gives her one hour to decide the matter. The brave girl, left alone, writes a message to the American Commander asking that he rescue Fairfax, and she sends her brother, a lad of ten years, on horseback to the camp. There follows a thrilling ride by the lad, shot at and pursued by the British outposts until he delivers the message to the American troops, who start to the rescue of their brave lieutenant.

Blackford comes for Marion's answer and when he shows her, through the window, Fairfax bound and facing six rifles which, on a signal from the English captain, will kill her lover, Marion consents to marry the villain to save Fairfax.

A minister, who has been summoned, makes Marion the wife of the dastardly Englishman.

Fairfax is released and permitted to go in the uniform of a British soldier, but Blackford has instructed his villainous sergeant to have Fairfax shot as he is about to leave the British lines and the brave fellow falls seriously wounded.

The American troops surround Castlewood, the British are driven off. Captain Blackford is killed and Marion is once more free to marry the man of her choice.

Fairfax is discovered by American troops and taken to the Castlewood amnsion, where Marion's skillful nursing restores him to health. Our last scene shows the marriage of the lovers. In the midst of their happiness a courier summons Fairfax to join his regiment, and the bride of a moment, shows her true American spirit by fastening her husband's sword on his belt and bidding him go and fight for his country.

A CLEVER NURSE.—A man is left to mind the baby while his wife goes out to do some shopping. The infant beginning to wail, he tries various methods of quieting it, succeeding at last by making himself up to represent the mother. A friend coming in finds him in his new costume and persuades him to go down to the cafe on the floor below. They take the precaution of first attaching a rope to the baby's cradle which they pull when seated at a table. An extra vigorous pull jerks the baby out just as the wife enters. Grasping the situation, she attaches the rope to a full pail of water, and the next pull drenches the unfortunate husband, and the wife following, vigorously completes his discomfiture.

PREVENTS TIRED EYES AND HEADACHES

The rapidity of our new shutter has been so perfected that 30 to 40 per cent. less non-exposure (which has heretofore caused the tremulous vibration producing so many tired eyes and headaches) is found in the Motiograph than in any other machine, making perfect brilliancy of picture and sharpness of outline. Together with the rocklike steadiness of the pedestal the flicker is thus entirely eliminated.

Five-cent Theatre and Vaudeville-House Managers increase their bank account with the Motiograph. Patrons who come once will always come again where they know they see the best pictures, positively rest their eyes instead of tiring them, and where all fire risks are removed.

The Motiograph

1909 Theatre Model, Especially Approved by the Underwriters Association

OTHER POINTS OF EXCELLENCE IN THE MOTIOGRAPH found in no other machines are: A special Film Rewind by which the film can be rewound with the main crank in two minutes without removing either reels or magazines, saving time between pictures and entertainments; perfected Fireproof Magazines, Fire Traps, with four rollers and with spring actuated flanged guides, preventing side movement and making it impossible for fire to pass them; never failing Automatic Fireproof Shutters; Perfect Framing Device; Flanged Sprocket Rollers to prevent film being torn or ruined by accidentally running off sprocket wheels; Enclosed Gears and working parts; Perfect Take-up with new form of belt adjuster; Lid Off Wide Open Lamp House making it easily accessible; Improved Arc Lamp with all Hand Wheel Adjustments; Slide Carrier Swing, saving one-third more illustration for the Motion Pictures.

A Romantic Story of Love and War

The tale hinges on the rivalry of an American and British officer for a girl's love. Duplicity, hate and cruelty on the part of the British officer who hesitates at nothing to kill or dispose of his rival, and the manner in which the American outwits him has created a film picture that has caused more comments of approval than any American production ever before issued.

If you want the best you will order this film.

Our next release of Centaur Film will be made on Aug. 4th and is positively the greatest feature this firm has ever produced

THE POWER OF LOVE

Approx. 955 Feet

M. P. Men! Here is the HALLBERG

Electric Economizer for Direct Current.

Guaranteed to SAVE 50 to 85 per cent. on your bills for M. P. Lamp current. Here is another PROOF of satisfaction.

HALLBERG-D.C. ECONOMIZER

PICTURELAND
645 Penn Street
Finest Moving Picture House in the City

Reading, Pa., July 8, 1909

MR. J. H. HALLBERG,
30 Greenwich Ave., New York

Dear Sir:—It is now four months since we installed your direct current "HALLBERG ECONOMIZER" and machine has always given entire satisfaction.

It saves fully 50 per cent. on the current bill. The machine requires practically no attention whatever except occasional oiling and cleaning. Machine runs very quietly, current is very steady and machine does not heat up like a rheostat. I have the machine in the basement and the controlling apparatus is mounted in the operating booth. Thus I have perfect control over the light at all times.

The market is full of A. C. current savers, but M. P. managers having direct current have looked in vain for a current saver that could be used on D. C. Your D. C. "HALLBERG" Economizer will fill a long felt want, and I cannot recommend it too highly. Wishing you success, I am

Yours very truly,

Editorial.

The Charm of Variety.

The French people have an apt expression, which, translated into English, says: "Boredom was born of uniformity." We have often regretted the sameness in moving picture programs, and while we had a twofold object in viewing the pictures, we could not dispel the idea that the public, whose one object was entertainment, would leave the show with a sense of dissatisfaction, even if they could not assign a reason. Is it to be supposed that the public like to see two subjects in succession, with the same cast, the same modus vivendi of any one manufacturer? One show that we recently visited had on three reels of comedy—one Lubin and two Pathes. The Lubin was a full reel, the Pathes had two subjects on each reel, all comedy and all on the same order, and the same actors taking part in two successive subjects. They were released the same day, but what of it? Is the exhibitor going to let this first run chimera ruin his business? Would it not have been better for the exchange to have made up these split reels to consist of subjects from two different makers? Some exchanges do this, and it is generally done in the rental of old subjects, so that it is not unusual to see a far more interesting program in a show that is running cheap service than in a show that is running the three reels first run each day.

As another example, a reel in last week's program gave two comedies from Edison: "The Missionary and the Maid" and "McGinty's Sudden Rise." The first brought a laugh, the second fell flat. If in between had been sandwiched a short drama, such as Biograph's "His Duty," the second comedy would also have scored by appealing to different emotions, even although it is the same subject that our friend Mr. Porter worked up about seven years ago under the name of "Casey and the Blast."

Exchange men say that it is next to impossible to select and arrange suitable programs, much as they appreciate its value. He is simply the disbursing agent of the manufacturer and must take what is sent to him. Two dramas on a reel, two or three comedies on a reel, what of it? They have passed the Board of Censorship, therefore they are handed out over the counter like so many feet of sausage, and so it goes on.

Now this matter of keeping up the public interest is so all-important that it affects every branch of the trade, and the manufacturer has the first opportunity to help by seeing that in sending out two subjects on one reel that they be as dissimilar in character as possible. Some manufacturers are already careful in this respect but not all, and it is of sufficient importance to make it a general rule.

The Producer's Art.

The producer of a moving picture company may be a man of many parts and his versatility is oftentimes taxed in the various scenes of one subject. But it is futile to suppose that the man who has made a success of comedy can be equally successful in drama. Temperament and education enters largely into the formula of the making of a moving picture, therefore, as we have said before, concentration of effort is essential to success. The same may be said in regard to the efforts of a manufacturer to produce a subject for which his studio and equipment is not adapted, or where he has neglected to give due attention to the little details which are not overlooked by a critical public. Our correspondence has brought forth several more or less fair criticisms of a picture recently released by Pathe, "A Western Hero," and some of our Western readers have pointed out many errors in the depiction of the Indian, the cowboy and the accoutrements of the actors. As this picture was not made in the West, but staged on the Pathe grounds in France, it was in some respects regarded as a masterpiece of the moving picture producer's art in showing what could be done with artificial scenery and make-up. But the denizens of the far West are as jealous of their customs and characteristics as the court of any European monarchy, and telling a picture story at long range is treading on dangerous ground like the novelist who goes to the guide books for his descriptions of foreign scenes.

One of our correspondents, an exhibitor, in referring to "The Western Hero," says:

"I was born in the West, have lived there for over forty years, been in every State and Territory west of the Mississippi, but never saw Indians wearing checked gingham shirts or pelts or skins for clothes, or live in huts or tents made of cornstalks, or camp in apple orchards. Neither have I seen cowboys with whiskers (they would soon be minus them, and the boys would have lots of fun doing it). Neither have I seen cowboys ride a bobtailed horse on an English saddle or carry a rifle as did the 'hero' (he must have been a tenderfoot). Neither have I seen an omnibus used instead of a coach having an automobile lamp and three horses abreast. Stage coach drivers, also, were not considerate enough to stop when they saw an Indian lying in the road. Not on your life! If he, too, was not a tenderfoot, the driver would have cracked his whip, then his gun, and drive around or over the Indian if he did not get out of the way, but he would not have risked his life and the lives of his passengers by stopping. Neither did I ever see a U. S. Army officers in undress uniform carry a sword so or wear his hat pinned up on one side, or kiss a girl on both cheeks (French style). Neither will you find such beautifully paved roads in the Western States."

The public appreciation of the motion picture drama is now so great that the public is becoming critical. They will stand for painted scenery, artificial props, and faked resemblances in a spoken play, because they know that it has been faked up for their entertainment. But in the silent dramatization they like to believe that the pictures are real photographs of the real scenes, and the public mind seems to resent any jolt which awakens them out of the pleasant dream. "The true mission of Art is to conceal that it is art." Therefore the picture producer of to-day, if he desires to avoid adverse criticism, must strain every nerve to present the reality and not overlook the minutest details.

The amount of criticism that this Pathe picture has called forth is no doubt largely due to the fact that the public has become accusomed to look for perfection of detail in all their productions, but the incident goes to prove that it is unsafe for any producer to make unguaged leaps into unknown fields, even if it is not an argument in favor of the various manufacturers specializing in their work as the most logical means of improving the quality and enabling the silent drama to successfully compete with the living stage.

Diplomacy in the Plays.

Long before the Japanese filed a formal protest with their consul at Los Angeles against the picture of "The Japanese Invasion," it was remarked to us that it would be strange if the picture did not stir up the ill-feeling between the two countries which has happily been stilled. Now we find that the long-buried jealousy between the North and the South has even been stirred by "The Escape from Andersonville," a picture which graphically showed the escape of Northern soldiers from a Southern prison. Several exhibitors in the South have written that they could not show this picture, and it has not always pleased where it has been exhibited: The New Orleans "Statesman" of July 19 has the following editorial comment:

"They Need Censoring.

"Complaint is made by those who have observed certain moving pictures in this city of the inaccuracy, from a historical standpoint, of certain pictures purporting to represent the Confederate prison at Andersonville, Ga. It may be contended, of course, that people should not go to moving picture shows to learn history, but such a contention may be easily met with the rejoinder that picture shows in New Orleans should not be permitted to attract patronage by claiming to present historical facts and situations, when the true fact is that they have drawn upon sectional prejudices for their facts and upon maliciously inventive imaginations for the situations they depict.

"No such Andersonville has existed as is the one described in the picture show story to which the Times-Democrat called attention this morning. Northern partisans have endeavored to paint such a place and such conditions in order to justify the infamy of the hanging of Major Wirtz, but in that they have uterly failed, for the truth of history has annihilated their malevolent machinations. The chief value of a moving picture show ought to be its educative value; for thousands attend them because they find it a cheap and attractive means of getting realistic information upon subjects of interest. When they purport to represent historical events or conditions—and especially where they represent subjects about which angry national discussion has waged for years, the representation ought to be unbiased and the historical setting should be accurate. Otherwise the educational value is destroyed and the representation disseminates pernicious error and hurtful prejudices.

"This incident shows how correct the organization headed by Mr. Denechaud was in its demand for the censorship of these shows. The influence of the picture show upon the sentiments and the minds of the masses is widespread and powerful, hence it should not be permitted to disseminate immoral, sectional or otherwise hurtful influences. The pictures ought to be censored, and only those that are worthy should be permitted to be exhibited in New Orleans."

The widespread circulation of the modern moving picture story would seem to demand that the plot and scenario should be so carefully edited that there would be nothing left which would be calculated to offend any class, community, country, nation or creed. In many cases it may rob the story of its point and render it valueless for publication. Careful editing and correct presentation cannot be expected where the manufacturers have to work overtime in keeping up with the inordinate demand for fresh subjects. Would not the public be better satisfied, the exhibitors, the exchanges and the manufacturers each make more money and have less trying experiences, if fewer subjects were produced, these of better quality, having a much longer run, and the manufacturers selling twice as many copies from each negative?

Advertising Feature Films.

Several exhibitors have expressed a desire to obtain photographic enlargements of scenes from feature films for display in their lobbies. Some manufacturers are going to great expense in providing large posters, lithographed in many colors, but there are many of the high class show houses that will not exhibit posters, no matter how attractive, who would be pleased to provide a suitable frame for the display of photographs. But the manufacturers do not see it in the same light. If they supplied photographs, at great expense, to all exhibitors, it is doubtful if it would result in the sale of any additional copies of the films. They might be willing to share the expense, however, with any exhibitor who wishes to adopt this method of advertising.

Some exhibitors are adopting the method of cutting the stories of the films from the pages of the Moving Picture World and from the circulars of the manufacturers and exhibiting them on bulletin boards in front of the theater, an effective as well as inexpensive form of advertising. The local family newspaper is always a good medium and we would like to see more showmen adopt this method. It pays, for it generally begets a lengthy notice of the show in the paper.

A bad policy on the part of moving picture theater managers is to let their candy boy distract the audience's attention from the picture on the screen by letting him yell out his wares when they are deeply interested in the pictures. For to make his theater a successful enterprise, he should strictly adhere to the rules and regulations of his competitors, namely, the high class dramatic theater. We were the victims of this sort of management one day this week, when we visited a down town moving picture theater. An elimination of this will, no doubt, be appreciated by the majority of the public.

ADDITIONAL LICENSED REELS SOON.

About September 1st, Geo. Melies, who has been granted a license under the Patents Company to manufacture and import, will begin releasing one reel per week. A studio is in process of erection in South Brooklyn which will be under the direction of Mr. Wallace MacCutcheon, for many years with the Biograph Company. It is also announced that the Selig Polyscope Company may begin to release an additional reel about the same time, and other licensed manufacturers are ready to increase their output if the demand warrants.

VALUABLE PRIZES FOR SCENARIOS.

Appreciating the necessity of interesting new writers and bringing out some fresh ideas, the Moving Picture World had prepared an announcement of a prize competition for moving picture plays, which would have been advertised in our next week's issue. Unknown to us, a manufacturer had been working up the same idea, which is advertised this week, therefore we will keep our scheme under cover until the other is over. Mr. Gaston Melies is the first manufacturer to offer such generous sums for scenarios, and we trust that many of our readers will enter the contest and try to get his money. The conditions are clearly given in Mr. Melies' advertisement in this week's World, and we have only to add that the judges will be an exhibitor, an exchange man, a manufacturer, a member of the Board of Censorship and the editors of the trade and theatrical papers.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

CHAPTER XII.—CARBONS.

This subject is one of greatest importance since it involves the matter of light—the very foundation stone of projection. I believe it will be valuable to the operator to know what carbons are made of and how they are made and to that end a short dcsertation on their manufacture will be included. Carbons are made from 7 inches to as much as 30 inches in length. They are supposed to be perfectly round and straight, but a variation of 1½ per cent of the nominal diameter is allowed in the matter of roundness and a 7-inch carbon may be 1-32 or a 16-inch one 1-16 out of true as to straightness without being rejected. Carbons are made from a mixture of three substances in varying proportions, viz.: soot obtained from the imperfect combustion of pitch, tar, naphthaline, oils or resins, retort carbon formed in process of making illuminating gas and petroleum coke obtained in process of distillation of mineral oils. Soot is the best form of carbon, retort carbon comes next and petroleum coke is poorest. The quality of the carbon depends largely on the percetage used of the above named materials. Quality is judged by breaking a carbon and examining the fracture also by the sound when struck, but this is beyond any but the expert. Some operators claim they can judge of the quality of a carbon by its color and gloss, but in this I believe they are mistaken. The expert in carbons might be able to tell something from the exterior of a carbon but hardly an operator. In manufacturing carbons the materials are first thoroughly pulverized into a dust, then purified and metalic particles removed by action of a powerful electro magnet. The binder is now added and the mass mixed to a stiff dough or paste. For binder common coal tar is most commonly used, though some makers employ a special syrup (sugar syrup, I understand it to be). After the binder is thoroughly incorporated the mass is passed between heavy rollers under great pressure and is then stamped into blocks 12 inches in diameter by about 16 inches in height. These blocks are placed in a hydraulic press in which is a steel die the size of the carbon being made. If it is to be a cored carbon a steel needle the size of the core is placed in the center of the opening. The press now forces the mass through this die under pressure of several thousands of pounds per square inch. As the carbon rod leaves the die a steel wheel runs along it printing the maker's name and other marks, usually denoting quality. The rod is next cut into 36-inch lengths which are allowed to roll down a slightly inclined table to straighten them. They are then tied in large bundles and baked for several days at a temperature of about 2,700 degress F. This baking reduces the binder into a substance closely resembling very hard coke. The rods are now cut into stock length, tested as to straightness, examined for imperfections and pointed. Those to be cored have forced into their centers a stiff mass formed of a powder obtained by grinding up defective carbons which have been baked mixed with water glass. The percentage of water glass in the core is a most important matter. The more there is of it the longer arc, within certain limits, can be pulled with a given current. The carbons are thoroughly dried after coreing, but not again baked, and are then ready for use.

In purchasing carbons it is better to get as long stock as you can use in your lamphouse and considerable saving is effected if you can use 12, or even 10-inch carbons, at least for the upper. There is just so much waste to each carbon in the form of a butt, averaging, usually, three inches in length. This waste is the same with a six-inch as with a 12-inch carbon, but if your 12-inch stock is cut in two and used in the form of two 6-inch pieces there are two butts instead of one. Do you see the point? In other words, when using 6-inch carbons you waste one-half the stock in the form of butts, whereas with 12-inch carbons you waste but one-fourth. Where a house runs all day and evening too this item will amount to more dollars than you would imagine in the course of a year. In a house using strong light, running continuous 11 hours per day, there will be about 350 more 12-inch carbons used in a year if cut into 6-inch length than would be consumed by burning 12-inch stock. Where 12-inch stock is cut into 6-inch lengths the whole bundle may easily be sawed in two with an old carpenter's handsaw, provided it be done before the bundle is loosened. A coarse, low-speed emery wheel is best to sharpen carbons on, but in lieu of that a 10 or 12-inch cabinet rasp is excellent. If you are using alternating current be very careful to sharpen your carbons with a true point, being particular to get the small, flat space at the end always about the same. The point, particularly the flat space at the tip, will be your guide in setting the carbon and, as will be later explained, it is of utmost importance that you get your carbons set exactly right with alternating current. Cracks running lengthwise of the carbon are not faults but rather evidence that the carbon has been well and thoroughly baked. Cracks running around the diameter, however, are serious faults and any such should be promptly thrown away. In making your purchases insist on examining ends of cored carbons and reject any bundles in which are many carbons containing imperfect cores. You cannot get good light with a carbon having a bad core. The core is for the purpose of holding the current central in the carbon. The soft core has a relatively higher conductivity than has the hard carbon surrounding it. This holds the current to the center of the carbon and enables you to maintain a better crater and keep it where you want it. When using direct current it will frequently happen that the lower carbon will burn to a long "needle" tip and there will be a little heap of black powder on top of the lower carbon arm. This is due to the fact that the binding material is burning out, thus leaving the carbon itself free and it drops away without being consumed. This is due to abnormal heating through higher resistance of the carbon and may be remedied to some extent by using a larger carbon, though even the ⅝ size will do it sometimes when you are using a heavy current. That it is due in considerable extent to poor carbon is proven by the fact that one carbon will not needle at all while the next one, of same size and kind, will needle for 2 or more inches. This shows there is a vast difference in the resistance of carbons—or the writer thinks it does anyhow. He may be wrong, but this is the explanation which appeals to him. The formation of glass-like beads on a carbon tip is evidence of high quality, this being the only residue of voltalized soot. It frequently happens that a thin-stemmed, mushroom-shaped tip will form on the lower carbon when using direct current. This is due to the carbons being held too closely together, thus excluding the free passage of air to the crater. Under this condition particles of voltalized carbon are carried along by the current instead of being consumed. In the arc they are converted into graphite and cling to the tip of the lower carbon. This graphite "cap" presents high resistance to combustion and remains until it falls, or is knocked off. Once started by too close contact of the carbons the mushroom grows until it is sometimes half an inch long and you will have poor light as long as it is there. It can be consumed by burning a long arc but the best way is to knock it off with a screwdriver blade and be more careful in future. The white ash which forms inside the lamphouse when using cored carbons is the residue of the water glass contained in the cores. As to the size and kind of carbons, that will depend on several things and will vary with individual cases. For alternating current it may be said that ⅝ cored above and below is the thing in practically all cases. For direct current ⅝ cored fills the bill above, but either ⅝, 9-16 or ½-inch cored or 9-16 or ½-inch solid may be best below, according to individual preference or the current strength used. If solid is used below do not get too hard a carbon or your light will have a tendency to be yellow. Try the different carbons until you get the one which gives best results, but don't decide by burning one carbon. Give each one a day's trial at least. In putting you carbons into the clamp it is necessary to use considerable pressure on the clamp, since if there is not good contact, much heat will be generated through electrical resistance due to poor contact. If the contact is very poor there may be arcing between the carbon and clamps and this will consume carbon, still further loosening the connection and unduly heating the carbon arm and clamp. Don't overdo the matter of pressure, however, as the carbon arms and clamps put out with many lamps are very weak, especially when hot. Use judgment and common sense.

BETTER LIGHTED THEATERS.

The need for better illumination of the interior of the theater without interfering with the brilliancy of the picture on the screen has brought out several schemes for brightening the screen. First came Curtainyline, then an elaborate scheme for projecting the picture on a specially prepared sheet of plate glass. Finally we have Silverine, a curtain coating which is placed on the market by the Monarch Film Exchange Company, of Oklahoma City, Okla. The standing of the Monarch Film Exchange in the trade assures us that they would not stand sponsors for an article that was not fully as good as represented, and they have tested the Silverine curtain coating thoroughly in the theaters of their own customers before they began to offer it to the trade. We advise all exchanges to get in communication with them and invest in a trial package.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

I have some straight talk for the readers of my letter this week. It has often been said that there is honor even among thieves. I have never been able to verify this except by hearsay, but if only a small fraction of what I hear is true, it would seem that many branches of the moving picture business have dwindled below the sphere to which the saying is applied. I realize that lectures are dry and frequently bear little fruit, but I am confident that an occasional sounded warning may be heeded. If one-half I hear is true, the relations existing to-day between exhibitors and renters, and the renters themselves, are such as to command the most serious consideration. I admit that many allowances must be made; it must be admitted that in every hour of the twenty-four the exhibitors who have been in the habit of reaching out for bargains in other lines are doing the same thing in the picture business. They seek the best and cheapest they can get from the film exchanges, and in doing this, some very questionable tactics are resorted to. At the same time it must be admitted that the film exchange people are doing their level best to bargain for self-interests, and the zeal in this connection has become so pronounced that the conservative observer is frequently obliged to sit down, think and worry. I have at the present time scores of letters of a critical character that would not bear publication. I have read and re-read them, and the more I read the more firm become my convictions that many of the men engaged in the moving picture business, both as renter and exhibitor, could make more money, with the same applied energy, in some other line.

The exhibitor's chief view appears to be the discomfiture or annihilation of competition. In this fight he looks to the exchanges for a backing. This, in itself, is hardly fair, but the unfairness is wiped out in a great measure by the circumstances attending brisk competition. What I am driving at is that half the time the film exchanges make promises to the exhibitors which they know they cannot keep. In other words, they promise what they will not, or cannot, do, when the time comes to deliver the goods. Some exchange men promise, and sign contracts, to do certain things which they know from the start they cannot perform. The eagerness for business exceeds the exercise of good judgment. The main aim seems to be to get a customer, regardless of good faith or the recognition of obligations.

I have in view one exchange man who agreed to serve a customer at about one-half he was paying and give him as good, if not a superior, show he was receiving. The promise was only what is commonly known as a stall, but it was worked to the limit in order to gain the customer. The guarantee was fulfilled for the first week or two. It was figured that it made little difference what the customer thought after a week or two of good service. After that it was a matter of argument. The result was that the exchange that first served the exhibitor lost a customer it was serving at a good margin of profit, and the exchange that bagged him in competition drove the customer away in disgust. This applies to the licensed and independent exhibitors with equal force.

It may be said with some degree of truth that everything is fair in love and war, but accepting this as a sane basis for action in the moving picture business, the methods resorted to by many are far-fetched and devoid of all fairness. In all branches of industry, large and small, vital and indifferent, except the moving picture business, there are times when even the most mercenary and unrelenting will give a point. If they do not do it as a matter of courtesy and common decency, they do it as a matter of policy. It is a regretable feature of one of the foremost lines of business of the day, and there can be but one result—the dog-eat-dog methods will gradually undermine the entire field; and the people who manufacture the goods that form the basis of operations will be obliged to directly control the business for self-preservation. This has been foreshadowed many times during the past two years. It is not used here either as a forerunner of what is about to take place, or a threat, but a reminder that greediness and recklessness must eventually bring about a retrenchment for self-preservation that will wipe out many who are now in the business.

The leading economists of the world have argued for years, and been sustained by results, that the higher the wages of labor the better will be the selling prices of commodities. The same argument holds good in the moving picture business. The exhibitor who exhibits old films such as are known as junk cannot expect to do the same business as that done by the competitor who keeps marching with the times. The more up-to-date customers the film exchange has, the better are the prices received, and the exchange is in a better position to buy up-to-date stock, which naturally keeps the producing plants in more active operation.

One of the most foolish theories of the present day is the one held out by many exchanges and exhibitors as a cover for failure to keep up to date in the furnishing of new subjects. It is true that thousands upon thousands of people have never seen an equal number of subjects in the moving picture line that were made four, five and six years ago. To them these subjects would pass very well. But it must be remembered that the audiences in their entirety are not made up of these people. It must also be remembered that audiences are critical. They look for a full return of the admission fee and they see as well as others the advancement that has been made in the production of the pictures. The audience can quickly discern whether or not the place of amusement is going forward or backward. The successful vaudeville manager does not fall back upon old-time acts. He is always on the alert for something new, novel and interesting, and when the moving picture man loses his hold upon this standard he loses his patronage.

There is no little commotion among the film exchanges over the notice by the express companies that they will not accept for transportation, after August 1, moving picture films that are not encased in metal boxes (tin excepted) and these boxes enclosed in wooden ones. The express companies shoulder the responsibility for this upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. That may be all right. If the Commission really originated the idea, the express companies should be deeply grateful to it, as the increase in revenue on the increased weight of the millions of packages sent through their hands annually will bring to them an enormous increase in revenue. The ruling is as arbitrary as it is silly. It is based upon the assumption that moving picture films are subject to spontaneous combustion, which is certainly ridiculous. In the West the film exchanges are combatting the matter by suits in court to prohibit the express companies from enforcing the new rule. In the East, efforts are being made to settle the matter amicably by conferences. If either or both fail, it is quite likely that there will be a general raise in rental rates. To comply with the rule the film exchanges will be put to great expense in providing the metal and wooden boxes required. Even if the rates are not raised, the exhibitors who pay express charges on the films shipped to and shipped by them will find a material increase in expenses. And so it is with the moving pictures. Somebody is always framing up a bang at them. OLIVER.

SMALL THEATERS WILL BE GIVEN A CHANCE.

Proprietors of moving picture shows in Pennsylvania, if they are able to convince the deputy factory inspector of their district that their places are safe, will not have to go out of business whether or not their theaters comply with the newly enacted law regulating small play-houses. The position of Factory Inspector Delaney relative to the new act, the constitutionality of which will be tested by the moving picture syndicate, is set forth in the following letter, which he has sent out to every factory inspector in the State:

"The law governing aisles and exits in moving picture halls and other places of amusement outside of cities of the first and second classes, and the attitude of the Department of Factory Inspection in respect thereto, is herewith set forth for your instruction:

"The law calls for three aisles, a center one and two side ones, each of not less than four feet width, and leading, without obstruction, to the external exit of the auditorium. The same provisions to galleries, from which, in addition, there must be provided external fire escapes.

"Manifestly, there are places now used for amusement purposes which are unsafe and cannot be made safe. It is as manifest that there are other places which are unable to conform to the requirements of the law, and the latter can be made safe by different arrangements of the aisles, and be made even more safe than by literal compliance with the terms of the law. This is effected by a system of cross aisles leading to side exits. Where this is done, by providing one or more cross aisles leading to one or more side exits, according to the size of the room, the arrangement will have the approval of the department. This concession will be made only where the statutory provisions are impossible and where the concessions will fully procure safety to patrons in case of fire or panic."

Express Companies Modify Ruling On Films.

TIN BOXES AND FIBRE CASES WILL BE ACCEPTED.

The committee that was appointed at the last meeting of the Film Service Association to co-operate with the Patents Company and the manufacturers in petitioning the express companies to modify the order in regard to the carrying of films which we published in our issue of the 17th, met the Board of Traffic Managers of the express companies on July 23. The safety of the tin boxes was demonstrated, and Mr. Macdonald, on behalf of the manufacturers and the Patents Company, pointed out that non-inflammable film was now in general use and would soon replace all other. He also drew attention to the absurdity of that part of the order which called for "metal cases (excepting tin)," as, under that ruling, lead or other metals with a much lower melting point than tin could be used. As a result of this hearing, the express companies, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, have modified this order, eliminating the words "exceptin tin" and adding the words "fibre-board boxes or pails," so that that part of the notice now reads:

"Accept only when in heavy metal cases enclosed in wooden or fibre-board boxes or pails."

They must bear a label printed on red paper not less than three inches square, reading as follows:

MOTION PICTURE FILMS.

Must not be loaded or stored near a radiator, stove or other source of heat.

Will you please take notice of the above and be prepared to comply with the same on all your shipments of moving picture films on and after August 1, and oblige.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION OF PENNSYLVANIA is now an organized body ready to protect the exhibitors.

On Wednesday, July 28, 1909, at 2 P. M., a number of exhibitors assembled from various parts of the State of Pennsylvania assembled at the Odd Fellows' Temple, Broad and Cherry streets, Philadelphia, for the purpose of joining the ranks of the new movement.

At 2.45 the meeting was called to order by temporary Chairman Chas. Segall and temporary Secretary Otto Miller.

On the motion of the chairman, the visitors were asked to step into another room, while the charter members would hold their meeting.

Mr. Lewis M. Swaab made a motion, asking the chairman to extend the courtesy to the representatives of the press to remain for the private meeting.

Temporary Secretary O. Miller read a number of encouraging letters, one of them from the Moving Picture World, wishing the best success to the new organization.

The following officers were elected for one years: Chairman, G. W. Bennethum; Secretary, Otto Miller; Treasurer, Chas. Segall.

A $10 initiation fee and dues of 50 cents per week were adopted.

The charter members are: Geo. W. Bennethum, Otto Miller, Chas. Segall, Lewis M. Swaab, Frank Moore, M. M. Stiefel, Chas. A. Calehuff, Jos. Cohen, C. Paul Warrick, Wm. Mancoff, John F. Hayes, Robert Holt.

The visitors were then invited to the meeting, and after several arguments, in which some unscrupulous exhibitors tried to wreck the good work of men who had given their time and advanced the money to promote a solid organization for the benefit of all, the Association was fully recognized and the promoters were agreeably rewarded by the number of new members, and each member gave his $10 initiation fee with the satisfaction of knowing that from now on the exhibitors of Pennsylvania have an organization to look after their interests and not allow the next Legislature to pass such arbitrary laws as the ones of last session, which caused such a loss not only to the exhibitors but to the renters and also to the manufacturers.

The next meeting will be held on August 11, at 2 P. M., in Room C, 7 Odd Fellows' Temple, Broad and Cherry streets. Please attend.

We urge all the Pennsylvania exhibitors to send at once their initiation fee to Treasurer Chas. Segall, 608 South street, Philadelphia Pa., as such movement must be supported and it is necessary to have a large attendance for the next meeting.

Philadelphia, Pa.—E. Howard Lanagan has been awarded the contract to erect a motion picture theater for Arthur Blackburn at the corner of Forty-ninth street and Woodland avenue.

OPERATORS ARE NEITHER DISHONEST OR FOOLS.

By F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

The Man About Town makes sundry and diverse remarks concerning operators in July 3d issue, which same doubtless caused the said M. A. T. sleepless nights in their evolution and final perfection. Without defending any operator, if any there be outside the over-vivid imagination of the superheated gray matter of some exchange manager, who switches service in return for a monetary salve, let me say right here and now that the average exchange is receiving fully the measure of "fair dealing" that is coming to it!

What sort of a dose does the average purveyor of films hand out to the operator, huh? Oh, he is simply wild to treat the operator right—sure he is. (May the Creator forgive me for that lie.) Films with no leader, ditto tailpiece; films with loose patches; films with missing sprocket holes; films with patches made with glue, which sound like a switch engine with worn tires negotiating a frog when they go through; films that would make a deluge retire in crestfallen, blushing confusion. My experience is that the film exchange is amply and abundantly able to take full and complete care of itself, and anyone who succeeds in getting anything on one of them is but playing even. I don't approve of any operator doing dirty work, however, but I very much doubt if Mr. M. A. T. could find much of the work complained of if the real facts were sifted out from the chaff of talk. An exchange solicitor who loses a customer, with or without just cause, likes to lay it to someone, of course. That is but natural! And who so handy as the operator? He's a poor, underpaid devil, anyhow, and an ideal goat. Ergo, he's "it." As to operators experimenting with the light, showing supposedly non-inflammable films to friends: All I can say is that Mr. M. A. T. has dreamed his dream backwards and got out of bed upside down. No operator would, or will, think of such a thing as turning the light on a film he does not know to be non-inflammable. Operators are not fools. They have some brains, Mr. M. A. T., even though you, in your superior wisdom, may not think so. Mind you, I said operators. If you were speaking of dubs and would-be's, say so. Choose your words, Mr. M. A. T., or kindly swing your under jaw upwards and prop it in place. Don't insult operators by insinuating that they will run a deliberate and needless risk of burning the building down unless restrained by the wise manager or owner. If you really mean that some would-be's may do so, kindly say what you mean.

Really, the writer is tired of seeing every wiseacre jumping onto and eternally criticising the hardest worked and in every way most abused man connected with the show. It is the operator who gives the show. It is the operator who is cooped up in a little iron-lined box when the thermometer is 100 in the shade. It is the operator who has to take the credit with the audience when he has to stop the show to mend a bum patch sent out by a film exchange. It is the operator who gets roasted by the audience every time, when nine times out of ten the fault is with the junk handed him to make a show with. It is the operator—but what's the use? I could fill a page! I wouldn't object to writers, even though they did not know a cam from a crankshaft, handing incompetents as many "bunches" as they desire; but please bear in mind that there are some real operators—men of knowledge, experience and mature years—who do not relish blanket insinuations of dishonesty or ditto of criminal foolishness.

HAS STRYCKMANS RESIGNED?

It was rumored around town this week that Mr. H. J. Stryckmans had resigned as Secretary of the International Projecting and Producing Company. When our representative called upon Mr. Stryckmans he would neither affirm nor deny the report and simply said that he had nothing to say for publication. Mr. Murdock could not be located, but the report has been so generally circulated that there must be some foundation for the rumor. When we reflect that it was Mr. Stryckmans that organized the company, and that he has been actively engaged in promoting its interests ever since, it seems untenable that he should resign from the position of secretary unless it is to take up that of general manager. It is well known that Mr. Murdock's private interests prevent him giving proper attention to the management of the affairs of the International Company, and as there has been no other official head to direct matters it is common report that this is the reason why the company has failed to score the marked success in their special field that they might have attained.

HUNTING AFRICAN BIG GAME IN THE JUNGLES OF CHICAGO.

From the Chicago Sunday "Tribune."

How to shoot a lion in the jungle near Mombasi, Africa, without going any farther than Western avenue and Irving Park boulevard:

First—Get your lion. Almost any sort of lion will do so long as he has four legs, a waving tail, and a fierce expression.

Second—Make your jungle out of 5 cent bamboo fishpoles, artificial palms, and several weeks' work on the part of stage carpenters and scenic artists.

Third—Engage a gang of native beaters from South State street, including one giant with magnificent torso development, who looks good in the near-altogether.

Turn your lion loose in your encaged jungle, prod him in the ribs with poles and other annoying things, and then——

Let him have it with three polyscope cameras, a 303 high power rifle, and develop your films and sell them around the country to moving picture exhibitors for a total of something like $15,000.

That's the way to shoot a lion in the wilds of Africa on Western avenue, according to the theory and practice of the Selig Polyscope Company, who put Roosevelt through his Smithsonian Institution stunt long before the doughty ex-President ever filled a rifle magazine on African ground.

They didn't call his Roosevelt. Professional courtesy prevailed, and the nearest they came to it was to label the baggage unloaded at Mombasi with the significant letters "T. R." But it was Teddy, all right. Look at the photographs, note the flashing teeth, the "dee-lighted" expression, the strenuous life postures, and see if you don't recognize Theodore, or the nearest thing to him that can be materialized in Chicago at the present date.

Take Street Car to Africa.

It all happened one bright April day in the big inclosed yard out on the wild prairies of the northwest side. It was a queer place to go to kill a lion—you take the Northwestern L part of the way, and then change to a street car—but there are advantages to this sort of hunting. In the first place, you can get back home in time for a home cooked dinner, you don't have to get seasick making the trip, and the nearest thing to a jungle fly that fell to the lot of the intrepid nimrods was a specimen of the common house variety that rode on the lion's back when they put him into the ca—native jungle.

But don't fancy for a minute that even lion hunting a la moving picture is free from danger. On the contrary, it is just about as exciting a proposition as ever came off anywhere. Each and every man, woman and child who took part in the hunt is willing to testify to this fact, and two moving picture men and one certain newspaper photographer swear to this day they owe their lives to the fact that in an emergency they can make Sig. Dorando look like a hitching post for speed in a sprint. This proves the truth of the old adage, "once a lion, always a lion," even in a moving picture.

Eight thirty a. m. saw the hunting party assembled at the time clock, whence the start for the jungle was begun. It took some time to cross the Atlantic—the big yard—and it was well on toward noon when "The American party" arrived at "Mombasi." The coming of the famous party was heralded by several dozens of shivering colored persons, who scurried up the landing stage—right in the eye of the camera—bearing on their glistening backs the famous baggage marked: "T. R." A large white person in the kahki uniform and pith helmet that all good African huntsmen wear, superintended the movements of the dusky crew, and then——

There was a kneeling and bowing on the part of the black population, and lo, and behold, the celebrated American party—teeth, glasses, Kermit, and all, hove into focus. Even if he hadn't worn the teeth or glasses you would have known him by the energy in his movements. He stepped around like a man living up to a strenuous reputation. He chased the colored gen'men to their respective duties, shook hands, smiled, and posed with a speed that taxed the cameras to capture. It was Teddy sure enough, and every time he got out of the scene he took the world famous teeth out of his mouth and said:

"Whew. These things are hard to wear. It must be fierce to have 'em growing on you."

"Roosevelt leaves for the jungle," called the producer. There was a hurrying and scurrying of horses. The party was mounted, and to the tune of native African cheers and frantic gestures of delight on the part of the assembled populace, the party rode out of view, Roosevelt waving his rifle above his head to show what was going to happen to poor Leo when he met him face to face.

Setting Up the Jungle in the Studio.

Manufactured Jungle a Reality.

The scene shifted. It was the jungle now—a cage about sixty feet long by twenty wide, with the best jungle scenery to be purchased or manufactured in the city. A fine spring breeze agitated the bamboo and palms, and no one could be blamed for feeling like a real hunter when he faced the scene with a rifle in his hand. It was real enough to satisfy everybody, even unto the critical producer, who insisted on getting the last touch of atmosphere into every scene.

"You've got to have the real color in a moving picture show as well as in a stage production," said he. "We come as near to doing the real thing here as it can be done. Get ready for the hunt!"

From the vantage point of the camera men, who stood on a platform erected twelve feet above the ground, in order to be above the bars that formed the side of the cage, one could make out the jungle king as slowly and suspiciously he trod his way out of the wheeled cage and slipped through the gate into his native atmosphere. The gate was shut behind him, and he was trapped.

He didn't like it at all. Being a regular lion, he gazed around at the African foliage waving about him and shivered. Never had he seen anything like this. The jungle frightened him. He felt lost and yearned for the comforting bars he had known since his happy childhood days, and he began the wildest sort of a race through the intricate jungle paths, looking for some nice safe cage where he could lie down in peace and comfort.

From the camera platform it was the most realistic thing in the world. King Leo first picked out a path that led straight toward the film operators. His head rocked from side to side, and his tail waved in a way that made even an inexperienced lion killer apprehensive. Right in front of the picture men he changed his mind, decided to forego an attempt at leaping the bars, and dove back into the brush that hid him from view.

But he had left his track in the soft earth of the path. His doom was sealed from the moment he took that little stroll. Only a few seconds elapsed before there came creeping out upon his trail the chief of the native hunters, the great African tracker, who had come all the way from his south side home to see that the hunt was well supplied with the proper color. On all fours, his sharp eyes scanning the ground, the tracker crept forward. At the sight of Leo's broad tracks he stopped, bent closer to the ground, then leaped straight up in the air and waved frantically to the rest of the party.

They came forward on the run, Teddy, Kermit, and the great English hunter, whose guests they were. The great man got down to examine the tracks, made sure it was a lion, then he, too, waved his arms in frantic delight. His teeth gleamed some more, and native tracker and ex-President shook hands and Teddy said right out loud: "Dee-lighted!"

Primitive Wildness Aroused in Lion.

The hunt was on in real earnest now. The white members of the party retired for the nonce, and to the fore came a crew of native beaters, stripped to waist and armed with everything that might be expected to scare a lion out into an open spot, where Teddy might have a chance to bring him down.

The beaters disappeared, and again King Leo held the center of the stage. He was getting excited now. Animal instinct told him that he was being followed, and possibly he had read the Jungle News and knew that Theodore the mighty was on his trail. At all events, his movements became wilder and more natural.

Who knows—perhaps poor old King Leo knew that while the hunt was artificial in some respects, for him it was going to end like the real thing? Who knows but that his animal instinct told him he was to be butchered to make a moving picture film? Who knows but Leo saw his finish?

Certainly he could have been no wilder under any circumstances. He was raving now. His body dropped close to the ground, like a cat stalking his prey, and he eyed the human beings in sight with the malevolent gaze of an animal picking out the choicest morsel in a herd. Nearer and nearer drew the beaters, and wilder and wilder grew the lion, until at last he dashed back into the jungle like a flash of tawny light, and hid himself in the impenetrable tangle of brush.

From here he would not stir. The shouts of the beaters were of no avail. Leo clung to his cover. There was but one thing to do; desperate action was needed; Roosevelt must dash into the jungle and beard the lion where he lived.

Everybody took a long breath and braced himself for the shock. The crucial moment was at hand. Hitherto it had been something like a play; now it was getting to be the real thing. The camera men up on their lofty platform looked down and estimated their chances in a sudden leap for life. The producer bit his upper lip.

"Are you ready?" he called.

"Ready," replied everybody concerned.

Photographers Break Jumping Records.

There was a puff of smoke and the sharp crack of a rifle back in the jungle. The next instant there was a roar such as no lion ever turned loose in a cage, and Leo, his lower jaw broken by the bullet that went too low, burst out into the open, straight for the men on the high platform.

The vertical bars that inclosed the jungle were twelve feet high. Twelve feet is a good healthy leap even for a wounded lion, but Leo went into the air as if he was going to clear it with something to spare. Then it was that the two polyscope men, Tom Nash and Charley Turner, and the staff photographer, broke the world's amateur record for high jumping and quick sprints. They took one last, lingering look at Leo's gleaming jaws. Then they jumped. Recovering their footing, they sprinted, Nash in the lead, Turner a good second, and the staff photog. working his short legs like pistons to bring up a fair third.

Back in the jungle Leo hit the bars about eight feet from the ground, fell back, and retreated, bleeding, to the jungle.

The camera men went back to their positions. Again the stage smoke puffed in the jungle, again the real rifle spat out its smokeless charge. No bungle this time. There were two shots. One hit Leo in the right eye, the other went an inch above. Leo never stirred. He was killed as dead as anything that Teddy ever brought down in real life. Down on the home made jungle ground he sank at full length, and then and there he passed from the world of moving pictures into that happy hunting ground of wild animals, where hunters do not exist, or if they do, it is the animals who have the guns.

The Lion. Congratulations.

Bringing the Lion into Camp.

"Get him!" cried the huntsman, by this time worked up to a state of real excitement.

The big native tracker, always on the job, burst through the underbrush and found the slain monarch. Again he raised his war cry, and again the party came hurrying up. The great English hunter took the lion by the tail and dragged him out into the open. Then came Teddy, his teeth gleaming as they never gleamed since the charge at San Juan hill, his neckcloth fairly dancing with excitement, his whole appearance shouting the triumph of the successful hunter.

The picked Leo up and looked him over. They counted the bullet holes and shook each other by the hands, Teddy and the black tracker almost falling over themselves in their mutual joy. Then everybody did a war dance around the corpse and Kermit wound up the scene by scaring the wits out of the "natives" with his camera.

Natives Do War Dance Around Corpse.

But the realism didn't cease here. They tied the game to a long pole and carried him back to camp. Here he was hung up and skinned. It was night now in the jungle, and the glow of the campfire reflected from the dark bodies and from Teddy's teeth made a picture never to be forgotten so long as the film remains in use. Altogether the hunt was voted a success, and everybody punched the time clock and went home, well satisfied with the first presidential day in the jungle.

"Only one thing about it that I don't like," sighed the wild animal man.

"What's that?"

"Well, there's a perfectly good lion, costing $300, that we can't use again."

And when you see the films you may agree with him that it's too bad. At the same time you will apperciate the realism of the hunt. One part—the most thrilling, perhaps—you will miss. The picture men refused to contribute their high jumping specialty to completing the truly exciting picture of How to Shoot a Lion Without Leaving Home.

COMBINING THE MOVING PICTURE AND THE PHONOGRAPH.

By Robt. L. Hastings.

I.

Ever since moving pictures commenced to be used before audiences, the idea occurred that it would add greatly to the effect of the pictures if we were able to operate a phonograph at the same time as the picture apparatus, so as to give the sounds of the voice or of musical instruments or any such effects which can be imagined, at the same time that we observe the movements of the image on the screen. The simplest case of this kind is, for instance, an opera singer whose movements are given upon the screen while the air is produced by the phonograph, and this will give a very realistic effect. Many are the combinations which can be imagined in such cases, and we have here a wide field of application for the phonograph and picture machine working together. At the outset, it would seem a comparatively simple matter to work such a combination of the two apparatuses, especially as inventors have solved far more difficult problems connected with electrical and mechanical devices. However, the fact that even after the picture machine has been in use for exhibition purposes for so many years we do not find that it is worked in connection with a phonograph shows that there must be some reason why the combination could not be carried out on a practical scale.

To work a phonograph and a picture machine in combination, we find that there are two main points to be considered. Take the case of a singer, for instance. We require to produce a picture band and corresponding to this a phonograph record, so as to afterwards reproduce the two records at the same time. First comes the taking of the record, and this is a comparatively easy matter. In a properly lighted place we set up a phonograph, which is preferably driven by a small electric motor, and the phonograph mechanism is coupled to the moving picture machine by means of a simple rod coupling which passes across from one apparatus to the other. In this way, while the artist is engaged in singing the air and making the usual gestures to accompany it, we take the moving pictures in one apparatus at the same time that we secure the phonograph record in the second apparatus. It only remains to reproduce both the records at exactly the same speed in order to realize the combination which we mentioned at the outset. Were the phonograph and the picture apparatus now to be connected mechanically in the same way, of course we would have no difficulty in projecting the pictures on the screen and hearing the sounds at the same time. But here comes the difficulty of the matter, seeing that in practice we are not able to connect the two apparatuses mechanically. This is evident when we consider that the moving picture apparatus must be placed at the back of the hall, at least according to the usual practice. On the other hand, the phonograph could not be placed beside the machine, as the mechanical coupling would require, as when in this position it could not be heard by the audience. What is needed is to have the picture machine placed at the back of the hall and the phonograph placed at a point near the stage or the screen, but in order to do this it is evident that the two apparatuses must be widely separated. But it may be asked why the two machines cannot be run together and at the same speed by the use of two similar electric motors mounted upon the same line. We have numerous examples of electric motors which are used in this way, and especially the type of alternating current motor known as the three-phase motor is adapted for the purpose, and two such motors when placed on a common line are known to keep at exactly the same speed. One such motor would be coupled to the picture machine and the second motor would work the phonograph, so that at first sight the matter is a very simple one.

The best answer to the question as to why the system of two motors is not used will be found simply in the fact that up to the present time we do not find that inventors are applying it on a very extensive scale, and therefore we conclude that there must be certain difficulties which prevent the use of this method in practical work. Such is, in fact, the case, but the reasons why the system cannot be employed lie in the domain of electrical problems, and these, as is well known, are often quite complicated. We will not consider this side of the question, as it would have but little interest, but will speak of the new method which has been brought out in France by a well-known engineer, Capt. Couade. After considerable work upon the question, he has now succeeded in overcoming the difficulties which the question presented and is able to operate the two apparatuses at the same speed by an electrical method. This is not the same, however, as the simple use of two electric motors on the same line, and is, in fact, a departure from this practice which is quite ingenious.

There is another point in the problem which must also be looked after if we wish to operate the method without any risk of failures. Not only must the two apparatuses run at the same speed, but in order to have at all times the exact concordance of the sounds and the movements we must be able to have some control over the apparatus, otherwise any slight mishap would put them out of step and this would spoil the whole performance. We thus need an adjusting device which the operator can control at any moment so as to put the machines in step during the performance. Such a device has also been realized by Capt. Couade in an ingenious way. It was while he was experimenting in another field that he found the method of working two apparatuses at the same speed, and he at once realized that it could be very well applied for the moving picture combination, so that he made arrangements with the Pathe firm, who have their large works in the suburbs of Paris, in order to set about constructing an apparatus of the kind. In this work he was aided by M. Marette and also by one of the skilled constructors of the factory, M. Continsouza. After some time they succeeded in producing the apparatus which we illustrate here.

There are two distinct parts to the apparatus. First, a phonograph which is driven by a weight. The weight is suspended from a cord which is wound about a drum on the inside of the phonograph box, so that the phonograph mechanism is operated by means of the drum. But at the same time the drum operates another device, which is the principal point of the system. This is an electrical device known as the "transmitter," and it is made somewhat like the commutator of a dynamo machine. Its object is to take the direct current from the lighting mains, for instance, and to convert it to three-phase current, so as to be able to operate a special kind of three-phase motor upon this current. The direct current such as is frequently used on city mains would not answer for operating the distant motor of the picture machine, but by converting the direct current into three-phase alternating current we are able to operate the distant motor. It will be outside of our present limits to enter into the details of the transmitter, and, besides, the theory of the instrument is a somewhat complicated one, but the general action of the "transmitter" and the motor will be readily understood. The transmitter is not a dynamo, nor does it contain any other parts than a revolving contact device combined with a set of electrical resistances, so that the current is made to rise and fall in a regular way as the instrument rotates, and thus the current given out from it has a regular wave-like form such as we have in the usual three-phase currents. Such current is now sent over a connecting wire (a flexible cable is used in practice, having three wires) to the motor which is mounted along with the moving picture machine. The motor is of a special kind and differs from the small motors which we usually find employed for driving different machines, but it is no larger than these, and, in fact, it is of light weight and takes up but a small space. If anything, it is cheaper to build than a motor of the usual kind, and, far from being complicated, it is, in fact, much simpler. The motor placed on this current line will run at exactly the same speed as the transmitter and also the phonograph, which is connected to the same mechanism as the latter, for the reason that the speed of the moving picture motor depends upon the number of pulsations per second of the current, and this in turn depends on the speed of the "transmitter," so that we now have the two apparatuses running at exactly the same speed. This has been proved very well in the practical working of the machines on this system. In practice it is found more convenient to mount the motor and all the parts belonging to it in a small box, which is quite easily carried about. When used with the picture machine there is a coupling rod joined on to the projecting end which is noticed on the left, and the other end of the rod, which is 2 or 3 feet long, is coupled to the picture machine. The motor box is set up on a folding tripod somewhat like a camera tripod, so that it is readily moved about and adjusted next the picture machine.

II.

By the present method the operation is a very simple one. We first set up the apparatus for taking the record as we mentioned above, using an ordinary phonograph (and not the weight-driven phonograph), which is coupled by a rod to the moving picture camera, as will be noticed in our engraving. In this way we produce a moving picture roll and the corresponding phonograph record upon a disk. Although a disk phonograph is used here, there is nothing to prevent the use of a cylinder phonograph by changing the apparatus somewhat. We now remove the disk from the phonograph and transfer it to the second or weight-driven phonograph, which is mounted near the stage where the pictures are projected. The current from the electric lighting wires of the building is brought to this point by flexible cable or any suitable wiring, and the wires are connected to two screw connections on the phonograph, which, it will be remembered, also contains the electric transmitter. This current must be direct current and not alternating current, as the latter would not answer the purpose. There are on the phonograph case three connecting plugs, which are connected by flexible cable or otherwise to the motor of the moving picture machine at the back of the hall, and the motor box has three like plugs for the cable. It only remains to start the phonograph by allowing the weight to descend and the current is now sent into the motor. The motor starts up automatically at the same rate as the phonograph and comes up to speed at the same time, and after this the phonograph delivers the record at exactly the same rate as the moving picture machine projects the pictures, so that the singer's position and movements correspond always to the musical air.

One point which we already mentioned must be looked after if we are to be able to use the present method without any mishaps while it is running. Were the picture band and phonograph record both perfect and no accidents occurred during the running, we would have them exactly in step all the while, but it might happen that the phonograph was not started up with the needle on the marked point, or else while it was running a shock might be given to it which would make the needle jump over some distance on the record. As to the picture film, we might need to cut out some parts of the film if they were faulty or for other reasons, so that we could no longer match it with the phonograph record. It is quite necessary to have a device upon the electric motor which drives the picture machine so that we can have some control over the machine without needing to stop its working. Besides, the picture machine must be run at about one-third of the motor speed, as the latter is too high to allow of a direct coupling to the picture machine. Capt. Couade combines the gearing for reducing the speed with the controlling device in such way that by turning the handle which is noticed upon the motor box we can act upon the gearing and cause it to work faster or slower by turning the handle forward or back. Turning the handle around once allows us to catch up one image of the picture film, and by turning it quickly we can catch up two or more images as we wish. The phonograph can be caught up in the same way, usually by a few turns of the handle. When the needle has been thrown over into the next spiral groove of the record, which is an extreme case, this can be caught up by making ten turns of the handle, with the apparatus working all the while. The operator soon learns to use the handle so as to keep the records always in step. Another arrangement which helps the working of the machine considerably is the use of a telephone so as to connect the phonograph with the cabin of the picture machine, and in this way the operator can always hear the phonograph in spite of the distance at which it is placed. In the present apparatus, the small telephone is noticed suspended across the mouthpiece of the phonograph, and a flexible wire connects it with the telephone receiver placed in the operator's box.

It is to be noticed that the present apparatus has been designed so as to use it with any ordinary moving picture establishment without making any changes, and anyone can set it up in a very short time. The operations of mounting are as follows: First set up the motor box on the tripod and adjust the height so that the motor shaft comes on the same line as the moving picture shaft. When this is done, we connect the two by the short piece of coupling rod. Second, upon the motor box there are three pairs of contact plugs with the names line, motor, battery. The first plugs are connected to the line coming from the phonograph, the second to a rheostat which is used for regulating the motor speed, and the third to two cells of dry batteries which serve for the telephone and electric bells. In this way there is no mistake to be made, and the apparatus is ready to work. To operate the phonograph, we place the needle at the marked point on the disk and then wait until the operator sends a signal by an electric bell, when we start up the phonograph. Before sending the starting signal, the operator has brought the first or starting image into place, and when this is done he pushes a button for setting his motor ready to start and also sends the signal by the electric bell. By listening in the telephone, he is sure that the phonograph has made the proper start.

The scope of the present apparatus is only limited by the shortness of the phonograph record, and as this does not allow us to take scenes of any great length, we are obliged to content ourselves with these for the time. However, it is possible that before long some means will be devised for taking long records, so that when this is done there will be nothing to prevent the reproducing of an entire opera or dramatic piece of any kind. Capt. Couade states that he is at work upon this very interesting question, and should he bring out anything new we will not delay in bringing it before our readers. Even in the present stage of the work, we are now able to reproduce songs or short dialogues, and this will already add greatly to the attractiveness of the exhibitions.

Before leaving the subject we may mention one point which has not been brought out, this being in connection with taking the combined record in the phonograph and the picture camera. If we suppose that an artist is stationed before the two apparatuses for taking the sounds and movements, he must speak or sing into the phonograph when quite near the mouthpiece, otherwise the record will not be well registered on the disk. But when in this position he is hampered in making the gestures which fit the words, so that these cannot be made properly. In practice it has been found best to make the records in the following way so as to secure a good result: First the artist sings into the phonograph and the record is taken while the moving picture camera is not working. Next, the phonograph is made to give out the song, etc., and at the same time the artist stands off from it and in a free position in front of the picture camera so that the pictures can be now taken. By listening to the sounds, the artist is able to make the gestures which are to accompany them, and at the right time. To do this takes some little practice, but in the end it is not hard to carry out, and the records are taken in this way in the exposure galleries of the Pathe Company. Very lately the apparatus has been placed before the public at an exhibition which is being given at the Cirque d'Hiver, one of the large halls in Paris, and we will have occasion to speak of this performance in another account.

TAFT SEES HIMSELF "AS OTHERS SEE HIM."

Laughs at His Own Energetic Gestures on a Moving Picture Screen.

President Taft looked at himself in moving pictures at a 5-cent nickelodeon in Washington last week. A chair of comfortable proportions was provided and the President sat in comfort, observing himself as he addressed the assembled Confederates and G. A. R.'s at Petersburg, Va., on May 19.

Mr. Taft watched the pictures with interest, but without manifestation until the Taft on the screen began swinging his right arm and shaking his fist at the Taft in the orchestra chair. Then the President found the spectacle so funny that he burst into that hearty laugh that has become famous. The laugh was infectious, and in a moment the crowd of spectators were on their feet, laughing and cheering.

The President went to the show in his automobile, accompanied by Senator Bourne, Gen. Clarence Edwards, Capt. Butt and Representative Lassiter.

When the pictures had been shown the lights were turned up and the band played the "Star-Spangled Banner." The spectators rose as the President and his party left the little hall. The party then went to Chevy Chase and played golf.

ENTERPRISE DISCOVERS A NECESSITY.

Through the enterprise of the management of the Open Air Theater Park, 138th street, between Third and Alexander avenues, a place of amusement has been established that has positively proven to be a necessity; the large attendance shows that it is appreciated.

The checking of baby carriages is a feature that cannot be too highly praised, as it gives the mother an opportunity to join the rest of her family and enjoy the show from any part of the park she desires. Another good feature is that all kinds of refreshments, such as ice cream, soda and other temperate drinks, are served at 5 cents a portion. Should anybody desire something more substantial they can get fresh frankfurters or hot corn at 5 cents. The program lasts three hours.

Bloomington, Ill.—Chris. Jackson has purchased the Scenic Theater here, and is now in possession.

Comments on the Week's Films.

"A Convict's Sacrifice."—A soul-stirring drama from the Biograph studio, which is made even more touching by excellent acting and good staging. Like other recent dramas from this company's headquarters, this is certain to appeal to a large number of those who see it because it is so good, and because it teaches a lesson that is admired and recognized by everyone, regardless of his condition or circumstances. To be made to understand that a man is a man, whether clad in the stripes of a convict or in a dress suit, is something worth while, and in this picture the Biograph people have emphasized this point very forcibly. It is one of those heart stories which appeals because it stirs the best that is in one, because it makes one feel that after all it is well worth the struggle required to do something which benefits another. And when this lesson is taught by a convict it becomes all the more impressive and convincing. The acting is above the average, and the climaxes are wrought out with a nicety of interpretation which makes them especially impressive and causes one to almost feel that this is no picture drama but real action which is taking place while the spectators look on from a distance, unable to assist, but only to see what can be done under some circumstances. And when the sacrifice is complete, when the convict, at the supreme moment, when he has done all for the man who befriended him that can be done, falls a victim to the gun of the vengeful guard, one feels that it is better that his life should end thus than that he should be again robed in stripes and forced to perform the hard, daily task of the convict. The testimony of his manhood is too convincing to make one want to see him incarcerated again. Death is far better. His spirit, at least, is free.

"Bewitched Manor House."—An interesting picture from the Pathes which furnishes opportunity for the introduction of various forms of magical personages and animals, something in which this house excels. The picturesque ruined castle is well worth a picture by itself, but after the travelers have entered and the wierd spooks and other strang objects appear the film assumes even more interest. Then, just as things are becoming so disturbing that they seem unbearable, a fairy appears and with a wave of that wonderful wand transforms it all into a most beautiful abode, inhabited by gallant knights and beauteous maidens. No wonder the weary travelers felt as though it was a proper place to rest. The film is good technically and the magical portion is managed with skill and judgment, as is usually the case with the Pathes' magic pictures.

"Little Busybody."—A comedy from the Pathes' studio in which a professor's grandson is made the agent to disclose some interesting bits of scientific knowledge, as well as other matters equally interesting, if not quite so instructive. The film is well worth seeing and is a welcome departure from many which have been seen supposed to represent scientific subjects in some odd manner.

"The Romance of a Stranded Actress."—This picture from the Essanay studio contains many truths which should be heralded far and wide. It lays bare the hypocrisy of many who are saints in church, but devils outside. It is the usual story of the flight of the manager of a theatrical troupe, leaving his company stranded in a New England town. The leading lady, Agnes, as sweet and loveable a character as has been seen in motion pictures for a long time, is hurt by an automobile, and therein lies the opportunity for the village hypocrites to denounce her as an actress and refuse to take her in or even assist her in her trouble. When the parson takes her in, a committee from his church calls upon him and asks that he either turn her out or resign. He resigns, but as he goes about from place to place he makes discoveries which change the whole current of thought and action. One of the women he finds playing bridge. One of the deacons he finds somewhat intoxicated, with the whiskey bottle at his elbow. And with these matters in mind he returns to his home, but is speedily waited upon by a very abject committee who beg him to remain. The story is simple, yet it contains the strongest heart interest. And this unveiling of hypocrites, that is the best feature of the film. With the greatest reverence for the church and its members who are sincere, this film appeals to the writer as exceptionally good because it illustrates in a very graphic and personal way the hypocrisy which has come to be the great canker sore of the church. The picture should be a moral power in assisting those who are struggling against this evil (which was an evil two thousand years ago) to overcome it. The staging and acting are exceptionally good, while the photography is in the main satisfactory. The later Essanay films have shown technical improvement and the defects in this one do not mar its excellencies seriously. It deserves a long run and should teach a powerful lesson.

"The King's Conspiracy."—In this Urban film there is plenty of romance, much melodrama and a love story which is absorbing enough to keep everybody interested. To be a young recruit and perform such valiant service in behalf of a friend that one is rewarded by the king and also wins the hand of a charming girl should satisfy any beginner in the art of war. Films like this are interesting. The average audience can understand the story and the strong action keeps them watching to discover the next denouement. Good photography, good acting and good staging combine to make the technical features of the picture satisfactory, while the story itself develops interest as it proceeds. There is killing and fierce duelling, but a reason exists for it, and duelling in defense of a friend is allowable, even though death supervenes in some instances. One always feels that the one who is killed at least had a fair chance and could defend himself. If he failed perhaps it was his just deserts. The film is good and if a manager wants something alive and something that will arouse and hold the interest of an audience he can find it here.

"Sweet and Twenty."—The Biograph people have produced a film which will warm the hearts of the older ones who see it, since it will remind them of the time when they, too, were twenty and love's dream was young, and there were quarrels and reconciliations, and a determination to kill one's self because life wasn't worth living after one of those lerce misunderstandings which occur between kids of this age. One may not think that romance is as interesting as this, but if one will recall some of one's own escapades of a similar character, then this picture will appear more like a page out of one's life, modified a bit so that those who remember will not know it is yours. The quarrel and the making up are extremely well done. In fact, there doesn't appear to be much chance for criticising the acting of the Biograph Company these days, while technically there is little that could be improved. The film is good and deserves wide distribution that the millions may enjoy it, too.

"Jealousy and the Man."—If one wants an exhibition of the blundering misunderstanding of the average man this Biograph film will supply it. Here is a man getting jealous of his best friend because he discovers him whispering with his wife and when he sees a note slipped by the wife into the friend's hand he goes stark mad and prepares to kill them both. They reciprocate by making him numerous presents in memory of his birthday. This is all admirably acted and perhaps no better representation of unreasonable rage has been seen in some time. This film might serve as a lesson to those who are apt to be jealous of their husbands or wives. There is usually far less reason for it than the maddened individual supposes. Circulate this film and let it tell the story of unreasonable jealousy. It may exert a beneficial influence in places now unknown.

"Hiring a Girl."—A comedy from Lubin which shows the trouble Mrs. Newlywed experienced in visiting an employment office and getting chased by fifty or more women who wanted positions. She is rescued more dead than alive and taken safely home. The picture is funny and develops some new situations. Moreover, few who visit employment offices have this experience. It is usually extremely difficult to get a girl to go with you, let alone having half a hundred pursue you. Photography and action are alike satisfactory, even though the acting is largely rough house.

"Mexican Bill."—A Lubin Wild West picture, which has abuse of an Indian, the love of a girl and a cowboy, the ordering of the cowboy away, the attempted killing of the father of the girl by Mexican Bill, who had been handsomely chastized by the girl's cowboy lover, and finally a straightening out of the mix up which ends in Mexican Bill being presented with a necktie that is permanent, the exoneration of the cowboy lover and the marriage of the major's daughter to the cowboy. With these elements it would be impossible not to have an interesting film, and that is exactly what has been produced. The wild rush of the West is in it and there are plenty of dramatic situations which call for considerable self control to keep one's nerves steady. And there is applause when the affair is finished and everybody gets his deserts.

"Won in the Desert."—A Selig film which has snap and go enough to make it interesting, while the scenery represented is excellent. It is a love story, with the capture of the girl by Arabs as a motif and her rescue by sailors from a United States ship. Love stories are much the same, the only possible variation being in the details, and here there is plenty to keep up the interest as the party dashes across the desert, get into a running fight, push a foot bridge down and finally bring the captive safely to her mother's arms. Of course the young lieutenant gets the girl, as was intended, and what is additionally interesting, gets a partnership in a large business enterprise owned by the girl's father. The acting and staging are both in keeping with the subject, and details seem to be reasonably well worked out. Never having visited the desert it is impossible to say whether that is accurate or not, but those portions which are familiar deserve no criticism. The photography is good, which adds much to the attractiveness.

"The Bridegroom's Dilemma."—The Edison studio has turned out a bit of original comedy under this title which will arouse many hearty laughs before it disappears from the screens. For lack of a shirt, might be a sub-title which would express the situation of the nobleman about to be married when he spills coffee upon his drawer full of shirts, and has no others available. The Chinese laundryman who will give out nothing without a ticket, and other comedy features equally as good are introduced, and, as the nobleman is about to stand up for the ceremony the whole pile of missing laundry is dumped at his feet in presence of the assembled company. If anything more amusing or absurd has been conceived in months it will be well to bring it forth. The usual Edison quality in photography and staging add to the film's attractiveness.

"Casey's Jumping Toothache."—A bit of comedy from the Edison studio which is based upon the difficulties of the strong man who was made weak by a nerve racking toothache, and representing what happened to Casey at the dentist's where he was finally forced to take gas and had strange dreams while the tooth was coming out. Fortunately for Casey the dentist succeeded in disengaging it from his jaw and his troubles were mercifully ended.

"The Tomboy."—The Kalem Company has produced a film under this title which has many merits to commend it. For example, the scenery at the opening is exceptionally good. It is of Ladden Rock farm and is a beautiful example of a well kept estate. There is a girl who has grown up on the estate and is considered a tomboy, but who has many womanly impulses which develop with the picture. As is inevitable in a story, and perhaps many times in real life, she is loved by two young men, one of whom has been her companion nearly all her life. She refuses his advances, however, as well as the other, and there are a number of plots and counter plots by the villain to add interest to the occasion. Finally the whole matter works out satisfactorily and the young people are wedded. Dramatically this film is strong, just as many others from the same house have been strong. The acting is in keeping with the characters and seems to correctly interpret the conception of the writer of the story. The climaxes are well worked out and there is a continuity of interest which is maintained from the beginning to the end when the young man is pushed into the water and rescued by the tomboy herself. The denouement, where they talk it over and decide upon a wedding, is convincing and seems a fitting ending to an otherwise excellent tale. The photography is good and the action is well managed. The staging could not have been better and shows great care in working out the details. Altogether it is an unusually interesting film.

"A Case of Lumbago."—A Pathe which graphically illustrates the difficulties which beset a gentleman who attempts to keep a social engagement and look pleasant when he has lumbago and can't sit down. Notwithstanding his efforts he is given the cut by his lady friend who considers his disposition anything but charming.

"Sweet Toothed Dogs."—A Pathe which represents the difficulties which beset a dog fancier who, without thinking, gave a dog some candy. He gets a string of all the dogs in town after him, and they are followed by the people, the whole ending in a rough house at his apartments after numerous moving accidents and incidents by cab and trolley car. The action is lively, but the film possesses little point.

"Holding Up the Wedding."—A comedy from Pathe which deals with a delayed wedding, which served to supply opportunity for the inteded bridegroom to drink too much. There is little of interest in it, with scarcely anything either lively or original connected with it.

"The Monk's Mother."—A Gaumont in which the story is hung upon an unjust action of some French soldiers in killing a monk in Spain. Later the French officer who orders the killing seeks refuge in the house of the executed monk's mother, who gives him her son's gown to enable him to escape. As a lesson of good for evil the film is a success, but these pictures with unjust or unnecessary executions are not desirable and the producers ought to seek other and more satisfactory subjects.

"Brown's Moving Day."—The head of the house, in this Gaumont film, decides that the operation of moving requires his personal attention. The result is amusing, wholesale wrecking of the furniture and everything else. The dangerous character of the gentleman becomes known and he is removed, and then the moving proceeds.

"McGinty's Sudden Rise."—An Edison comedy that will not fail to please. McGinty, the tempery foreman, blown up on a blast, ascends far into the heavens, and when he comes down leaves a track of devastation, and is minus several members of his anatomy, but after the surgeon completes his labors he goes back as sound as ever to his cheering men. It is something like extracting sunshine from cucumbers to get fun out of a quarry blast, but the Edison studio has accomplished it. Everyone laughs because it can't be helped. The film is a good one in every sense.

"True to His Master."—A Gaumont which enables that firm's trained dog to do another turn in digging out of the shed in which he was locked to notify the police of trouble and to find his blind master. The principal interest is in the dog and he does his part well enough to win applause.

"The Man in the Moon."—A magic film from the Gaumont studios which illustrates a battle in the moon, and a good deal more of supposed occurrences among the heavenly bodies. It is pleasing and is well photographed. The fact is that it is pleasant enough to make it welcome. The man who prepares the plays for the Gaumonts, or the one who selects them, perhaps, seems afflicted with a perpetual liver difficulty and selects generally only those more or less lugubriously inclined. Perhaps this was sneaked in without his knowing it. If that is the case some more sneaking should be done. It is a welcome change.

"Introduction by Correspondence."—This comedy by the Vitagraph Company may contain some truth which those who patronize the correspondence schools might well take to heart. The gentleman represented has a harder time, perhaps, than most correspondence students do, ending in prison, but maybe the principle involved is substantially the same. Anyhow, though this is for fun only, it might be considered seriously by those about to begin and be used as a warning.

"The Adventures of Fifine."—A Vitagraph drama which is lively and interesting and ends so happily that seeming inconsistencies can be overlooked. If an escape from a boarding school, a long pursuit and a tumble into the arms of the very man she was seeking to avoid is not sufficiently melodramatic to please the most ardent lover of sensations it would be difficult to conceive anything that would, and when a series of such dramatic situations are developed by such actors as the Vitagraph Company the snap and go of it can, perhaps, be imagined. Technically the film is good and the staging is fair.

"A Hot Time in Atlantic City."—A comedy drama from Lubin which is good, as all of Lubin's comics are, furnishing activity and amusement throughout its length. The tramps' good time is well worth seeing and will afford many people who have never been there some idea of what can, and perhaps does, occur at Atlantic City when the crowds are there for a good time. The scenario is good and there is much in this bit of drama which will interest, though its main purpose is to amuse.

"Living Dolls."—A Pathe which is scarcely a drama, yet has some dramatic qualities. It is what might be termed a not unpleasant story, yet having almost no point beyond showing how foolish a man may sometimes become over a hobby. In this instance, when the man was shown that his own people are better than living dolls, he gave up his quest and decided to live for them.

"Champion Heavyweight Lifter."—A picture from Pathe which may have point in the country of its production, but which carries little of interest here because such street performances as are here characterized are unknown in this country. The nearest approach to them are found in the side shows at the popular resorts. But everybody will sympathize with the fooled crowd in their efforts to give the fake performer a thorough lesson, which should have the effect of breaking him of deception in the future.

"Mother Goose."—A re-issue from the Edison studios which is decidedly interesting and will add materially to any program. It should appeal with especial force to children, and grown-ups who remember with pleasure their own appreciation of "Mother Goose" will be glad to see it as well. It is a succession of pictures taken from those old child melodies which give in a concrete form the conceptions of the stories. And the children who have seen this film and have watched the faithful reproduction of "Mistress Mary, Quite Contrary," "Jack and Jill," "The Old Woman Who Lived in a Shoe," together with many others, will be more than ever convinced that motion pictures are quite the most entertaining of all popular amusements. The action in these pictures seems to be about what the children would naturally expect, and the movements of the little boy, who is personally conducted by Mother Goose, is as natural as the actions of any youngster could be under such exciting and altogether delightful circumstances. One wonders, when watching a film of this sort, why more of this character of pictures cannot be made. They are far better than those in which murder, suicide and homicide are so common, and it is certain that a majority of the audiences in any American theater would be better satisfied with them than it is with the pictures which represent the cruelties of war or the horrors of brigandage.

"Taking His Photograph."—This Edison film is supposed to be funny, but where the writer saw it scarcely a person in the audience laughed. It is too much on the order of rough-house, and recently rough-house pictures, excepting under rare circumstances, are not receiving the interested attention which was formerly accorded them. The technical quality is satisfactory and perhaps such dramatic interest as it possesses is up to the required standard, but it is a picture which would not have been seriously missed if it never had been made.

"The Last Confession."—Here is another of those gloomy pictures which one Gaumont producer seems to like to produce. This involves the substitution of a low-born child for a magistrate's child who died; and of course it turns out that the supposed son grows up anything but good and commits acts which taint the honor of the family. Just as the climax is reached the old nurse confesses and the son is sent to his parents, only to find his mother dead. The question may well be asked, What good can come to anyone in seeing this picture? It has some dramatic interest, but it tells no story which either instructs or amuses, and presumably a story ought to do one or the other, or both. The ruin of the gaming table requires no illustration. Hence it would seem that this film might well be omitted.

"Papa's Hat."—A bit of comedy from the Gaumonts which is interesting because it is novel and involves the wonder of a child. The little girl's consternation when the opera hat opens is well acted, and later her dissolution into an interrogation point while the hat opens and closes itself is a novel ending to a reasonably interesting picture. Technically it would be hard to improve it.

"His Rival's Hand."—An Eclipse film which tells a somewhat involved story, so involved, in fact, that it is difficult to understand. There is a love story and a presumed rival, though just where a rival enters after a wedding, is not quite clear. Somehow he obtains possession of a gambling I. O. U. which has been given by the young man, and he undertakes to use this to force his attentions upon the young wife. The denouement is reached when the young man's father, who has been sitting unobserved nearby, comes forward and pays the debt and embraces the young woman, accepting her as daughter-in-law, even though the wedding occurred presumably against his wishes. The photography is excellent and the scenery included in some of the pictures is particularly attractive, which is its redeeming feature.

"Midwinter Sports."—An outdoor picture by the Vitagraph people which depicts interesting Winter sports in Michigan, where they harness dogs to small sleighs and race them as they do horses. It is a short, but lively, picture, and illustrates something which is not generally known. It is not photographically clear, but perhaps this minor fault can be overlooked because of the novelty of the subject.

"Maryland, 1777."—This film tells a story of the War of the Rebellion in which love, hatred, courage and treachery are presented in sharp dramatic contrast. The opportunity for good action and facial display of the emotions is well taken care of by competent actors, and after the opening scene is over, sub-titles are hardly necessary to explain the story, as the action and staging are so convincing. In the house where we saw this picture, a lady sitting in front of us turned and said to her escort, after an exciting scene, "That villain deserved his, anyway." Such side remarks show that the spectators have their interest aroused. The general quality of the work in this film, save for a few minor technical faults, is so superior to the early work of the Centaur Company that it is obvious that the Film Import and Trading Company made no mistake in contracting for their whole output. Advance notices of their next film, "The Power of Love," say that it will be again as far ahead of their last. This spirit on the part of an American manufacturer should encourage the independent exchanges and exhibitors.

Correspondence

HINTS TO OPERATORS.

By One of Them.

Reading, Pa., July 22, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Being a constant reader of your valuable paper and being in the moving picture business for six years, I thought I would write you of some of my experiences and ideas of the business.

The picture business of to-day is rising in some things and falling in others. I regard the Motion Picture Patents Company as an advancement. At first the exhibitors were slow in grasping the idea, but now most all important exhibitors are licensed. It is a good thing, as it protects the exhibitors and gives them a better class of film. The censored film plan is an excellent one, as it will remove the stain that some petty film companies have placed on the business. No one can say anything against the moving picture as instructor. The invention of non-combustible film is another thing that will be a great help, but should not make the operator careless.

In getting around, I have met many good operators, and still more poor and unqualified ones. The worst ones, I believe, are right here in my own town. An operator's aim should be to get the best possible result, and as a good picture always talks well for the operator, what do they gain by carelessness? Practically nothing at all. Some operators I have met like to hurry through their work, and take no interest at all in what they are doing. It is much better to run the films at a natural speed, even at the sacrifice of running less reels. Reading while running is practiced by the best of operators, but is wrong, as the machine needs your whole attention. In some theaters I have noticed the picture to be out of frame for one to three minutes at a time, which is all due to carelessness. A good plan is to go over your film and take out all the places that are out of frame. It is most disagreeable to watch a picture and at the most interesting part have it jump out of frame. I think it also a good plan to have licensed operators in every part of the States, as there are too many so-called operators, whose whole experience lies simply in turning the crank. When a breakdown occurs it is a run to the machine shop, where he expects a man who has not seen a moving picture machine before to successfully repair it. The operator is not worth the name if he cannot repair his own machine when he has an ordinary breakdown. A manager should always furnish his operator sufficient tools and supplies. All operators should have a little mechanical ability, backed up with the knowledge of electricity. Yours very truly,

R. E. JOHNSTON.

THE FITNESS OF THE PRODUCER.

New York, July 26, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In your editorial of the 24th inst. I see that you have an article entitled "Old Wine in New Bottles," which should be of great value to every producer who follows in the footsteps of our worthy neighbor across the sea (Pathe), who not only takes and bottles the old wine, but does it with such great effect that he is opening the eyes of the whole moving picture world. And why? Simply because he has the good, substantial material at hand, namely, the characters, and, most important of all, the natural scenery. But the base of his success lies in his ability in coloring his films.

Again, producers attempt work for which they are not properly equipped. Take, for instance, the film, "The Sword and the King." Look at it and see how many minor defects there are to be found in it. Of course, it is good, very good, but for all that, suppose that Pathe had produced the same picture and had colored it as he usually does ones of that type. I dare say that it would have been 50 per cent. better. And why? All he would have to do would be to look up some ancient castle, which would be quite handy, and right there he would lay the foundation of success, also he would have had just five times as many people in the attacking party that besieged the palace of the king and dethroned and killed the ruler. I must say that it looked very much out of order to see a handful of poorly armed peasants attacking a king's stronghold and battering down massive walls, etc.

But producers cannot create headliners every time. Take the Biograph's pictures, which are hardly excelled. Was their picture, "The Cardinal's Conspiracy," as great a success as the one that preceded it, namely, "The Country Doctor"? No. And what a simple, original picture "The Country Doctor" was! Yet, for all that, as I sat and looked upon it, my heart shook with sorrow, and when the picture was finished I turned and out of curiosity looked around me, and, believe me, I saw more than one strong-hearted man and woman steal their handkerchiefs to their eyes. Of course, that does not go to say that they should stick to that kind of picture, but it does prove that when they take hold of something that they can handle they do justice to it, and so it would be with others. You see the Frenchman has us handicapped on pictures of old world history, for he has everything conveniently at hand and the people over there understand more about kings and ancient stories than we do. Now imagine Pathe trying to put on a story about our Presidents, Mount Vernon, etc. What success could we expect? Did we not have a laugh at one of his pictures only a few weeks ago, namely, "A Western Hero"? Did he not show us original Indians, cowboys, etc.? Well, that goes to prove that the American people are more capable of producing American subjects than a foreigner, and vice versa. Get wise. Stick to things that can be made good and real, and we will have no regrets. And another thing—don't worry about Clyde Fitch and the like writing stories for moving pictures; they are not paying that kind of money. May be soon, but not yet.

WILD WEST.

THE PHILADELPHIA KICKER AGAIN.

Philadelphia, June 12, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Well, the new measurement law has gone into effect. If a m. p. parlor is built large enough to hold 400 or more the authorities will tax the manager $525 per year. Does not than seem as if the grafters were getting in their fine work? But what can you expect? The exhibitors organized about a year ago to fight the $100 license. The first man that was to be put up as a test case got "cold feet" and laid down and "died." The exhibitors simply take the bait and swallow bait, hook and all. Now they are up against the real thing.

Truthfully speaking, the picture business in Philadelphia is not what it is cracked up to be. There are some 184 parlors in Philadelphia and not over 20 per cent. of them are making money. And why? If they will cut out vaudeville and give only the pictures and music they will come out all right. On Girard avenue there will soon be, within four blocks, five picture parlors with a seating capacity of about 3,000. In some localities this might be all right, but this thoroughfare won't stand it. The traffic is not there. It is a case of who will give the longest and best show to get the few nickels. The patronage is mostly drawn from poor working people who cannot afford more than ten cents per week.

Now for the film business: How are these for rental prices? Four reels daily change and machine, $31 per week; three reels daily change, good service (called the best), $27 per week; fourteen reels per week, ship seven twice weekly, $18. All the films one wants in good condition for $1 per reel. And these are members of the M. P. A. What is the business coming to? If you want more news of this kind I can furnish it. Yours truly, THE KICKER.

THE PROTECTION OF THE EXHIBITOR.

Racine, Wis., July 21, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I am deeply interested at this moment in the article headed "Exhibitors Seek Protection," in which the writer of the letter wishes to have the Patents Company compel each exhibitor to give the same number of reels for a given price. You say in your opinion if the Motion Picture Patents Company were to do this and dictate to the exhibitor, etc., the next thing they would be asked to do would be to place their own men in charge of the show and turn the profits over to the exhibitor. Not that exactly, but it is well that the exhibitor and exchange be bound by an agreement.

When the Motion Picture Patents Company first came into the limelight, a good deal was said about the phonograph and the records. Can you buy a new Edison phonograph record anywhere for less than 35 cents? Can you find a retail store where records are sold where the Edison Company have placed their own men to run the business and turn the profits over to the merchant?

Moving picture machines, like the phonograph, are sold for amusement, and are of no more use without the film than the phonograph is without the record. If the producers all ask the same price for their film, why should not the retailers all get the same price for film of the same age?

If an exhibitor wishes to give three or four reels of pictures for 5 cents, he should not be allowed any new film.

You say "one old and one new reel is enough for 5 cents." That's where you are right, but I do not have to go over three blocks from my own theater to see three and four reels of new pictures, changed daily, shown for 5 cents. I am using one reel and one song. Makes me look like 1 cent's worth, doesn't it? Is it right?

When I say new pictures, I mean pictures that are shown on release day or three to four days old. I am using first run. Monday, July 19, I used the Biograph subject released on that day. The other house had the same picture with two other reels of recent release. This is a very common occurrence. Mine is the first theater in this city to use moving pictures, the first to be licensed under the Patents Company, the first to try and make my theater along the lines of the Patent Company's ideas. The other house was licensed not more than three months ago and is controlled by a film exchange.

Why cannot the Patents Company, by one simple letter to this exchange, stop such competition or revoke the license? If I thought I had a ghost of a show, I would put on another reel, but the only thing I can see in it is that it would be to increase my expenses and have them add another reel to an already overcrowded program.

This letter is writen to show that prices can be made right, and not until they are made right will an exhibitor have any show against another who is owned or backed by an exchange. Ask the man who furnishes me with film, at whose very door this Chicago exchange has had the nerve to throw three, sometimes four, new reels of film daily. If they want the earth, I, for one, am willing to take to the airship as soon as they are safe enough to warrant me that they will not dump back to worse conditions than now exist. If I can get this letter through the lines, you may or you may not read it all. If you do, just forget it. That's what the Patents Company does.

Yours truly,

MORBID FILM SUBJECTS.

Vincennes, Ind., July 24, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—The various producers of motion pictures, in portraying the curse of excessive drink, have gone to extremes, and recently I noticed a most gruesome tragical scene enacted on the screen.

The daughter of a drunken sot had died, and after being dressed for buriel, was placed in a coffin. The girl had died as a result of being neglected by her father. After the prostrate form had been placed in the coffin, the drunken father entered and removed the clothing and left to pawn it. In this way he secured money with which to continue his orgies and drunken debauches.

Now, such as that does not take place once in a hundred years, and the portraying of such awful scenes, even revolting, should be prohibited. I do not remember whether the film was of independent or trust make, but you would indeed be striking the popular chord by saying something about the issuance of these drunken sort of pictures, especially when they turn to tragedy, and try to make films of the nature as the above mentioned. I am connected with several motion picture theatoriums, and have also written several scenarios, which have been accepted, but I have never tried to dabble in the revolting tragedy and in the impossible.

At the present time the Anti-Saloon League of Indiana is asking the proprietors of theatoriums to use this kind of stuff and even paying them to show that which is unreal. It would be well for the producers to get close to the real, and not try to produce something which they know nothing about. In closing, will state that I am a subscriber to The Moving Picture World, getting same at Boonville, Ind., which is my home, but the seeing of such a film has caused me to write you this letter, with the hope that you will give the subject some publicity through your paper, and, if you care, use my name. At any rate, a reply will be appreciated.

Yours very truly,
M. M. K.

LETTER FROM A CALIFORNIA EXHIBITOR.

Napa, Cal., July 20.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—The Novelty Theater recently changed hands, A. Rossi taking charge. The new management has made a great improvement in the shows. The pictures are the very best obtainable. Pathe's "The Grandgather" and Vitagraph's "The Foundling," were among the pictures shown this week and were applauded freely.

"La Tosca" drew great crowds to the Unique when shown there recently. It is a grand film and one which you want to see again.

"The Necklace" was well received by the crowd, as were other Biograph films, "The Violin Maker of Cremona," "Was Justice Served?" and "The Way of Man."

Other pictures shown at the Unique in the last few weeks include Vitagraph's "The Duke's Jester," Edison's "The Curfew Bell," Gaumont's "A Good-hearted Policeman" and Selig's "In the Sultan's Power."

The Unique recently had Samuel B. Holdsworth, the oldest singer in California, singing the illustrated songs. They are running a Baby Show at present, and following this are going to give a Punch and Judy show at the matinees for the children.

The Hayes is showing to crowded houses at all performances. This house always gives a good show. They show all of Selig's hits.

Educational pictures are growing in favor. We show this week Vitagraph's picture, "The Process of Manufacturing Fountain Pens," which was taken in the L. E. Waterman Company's factory.

As stated in your issue of June 26, regarding the staging of the picture, more care should be taken by both the licensed and independent manufacturers regarding this matter. There is too much artificial scenery used for outdoor scenes. The natural scenery makes a picture 50 per cent. better than if it is taken with painted scenes.

Hoping your valued paper gains in subscriptions this year, I remain, Yours truly,

R. D. K.

A BIOGRAPH APPRECIATION.

Spencer, Ind., July 17, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I desire to express, through your columns, my appreciation of the products of the Biograph Company. I see a great many subjects—in fact practically all the films of the better class—and it seems to me that none of the producers put out the quality of goods that the Biograph Company does. Biograph films possess all the vital points that go to make up a splendid picture story. In nearly every case the pictures show the plot so clearly that no trouble is experienced in understanding the theme of the story; the photography is above the average, probably due to the fact that they place the machine nearer the subject, thereby insuring sharper detail. One noticeable point in Biograph goods is the clearness of features of the actors, every little change of expression is noticeable, and every delicate shadow that marks expression or helps to accent expression is plainly marked. And the Biograph actors act. There is no apparent make-believe about it, they do the things they are supposed to do. In fist fights—for example—they fight. They hit and hit hard. More than once have I been led to believe that a knockdown had more steam behind it than was really necessary, or was "down on the bills." In their "A Rural Elopement" the fight between the hobo and his pursuers is very close to genuine. And in "It's an Ill Wind that Blows No Good" the young copper "pro tem" lays out the Italian with a blow in the back of the neck that has steam behind it. In "The Girls and Daddy" the two burglars put up a stage fight that looks mightily like the real thing.

And the Biograph people are such masters of facial expression and they so "look the part" that it doesn't seem like acting. They are masters of makeup and seem to pick the ones who are suited to the part. The blind sculptress, in "The Roue's Heart," had a beautiful face so stamped with innocence that she had everyone at her feet. And the child actress who carries the news to M. Flamant that the blind girl loves him is the cleverest child actress I have ever seen. She is so clever and acts so exceptionally well that at times I more than believe she is not a child, but one who has ceased to grow "in thews and bulk," a woman with a child's body.

But what appeals to me more than all other things about the Biograph subjects is the finish, the roundness, the completeness of the story. It seems that they forget nothing; every little detail receives just the attention it should have before the public sees it. In "The Burglar's Mistake" the details are so cleverly worked out that there is absolutely no loop hole left for adverse criticism. So it is with all their films that I have been fortunate enough to see. They put brains into the thing before it is put on and as a consequence they don't waste any film. One can take their subjects singly and analyze them and bit by bit they present the same polished, refined and wholesome character. In "Confidence," for example, in the final scene where the husband dismisses the blackmailer he does it so genteelly that one can not but realize that it is the product of a high-minded, clean-minded author. The melodramatics of the cheaper sort find no place in Biograph goods. "The Drunkard's Reformation" is a story of exceptional cleverness. The little girl at the play—hesitating between fear of and love for her father—tells the story of her thoughts through her wonderful eyes. And this story is a sermon; a masterful, powerful sermon on the evils of the drink habit. "The Salvation Army Lass" is another of those splendid preachments. I heard a minister say, as he left the theater here after seeing this picture, "That's a better sermon than I could ever preach."

The Biograph subjects all mean something and they help those who see them. And their comedies are clean and wholesome. There is no slapstick, knockabout stuff in them to disgust people. "The Sacrifice" is a quiet, droll little thing, a sort of a Mark Twain skit, that appeals to people. And when they want us to scream they give us "The Curtain Pole" or "Jones at the Ball." The "Joneses" are a great pair, clever actors and irresistibly funny.

In our little city we have a change of programme nightly and the manager knows that he has only to advertise a Biograph subject to fill his house, and we know that when we go we will not be disappointed.

CARL ANDERSON.

A PLATE GLASS "CURTAIN."

Since there has been such wonderful improvements made with the moving picture projecting machines of late, it is only natural that the screen should come in for advancement. Several preparations are on the market for the purpose of bringing out the pictures plainer and a screen has now been invented (and patent applied for) made of glass, and claims are made that this screen brings out the pictures in a most wonderful manner, adding sharpness, brightness and interest to the picture to a remarkable degree. One of the plates has been on exhibition at the Crystal Theater at Shelbyville, Ind., for several months. It is a great success from a standpoint of better pictures and a drawing card. The process of manufacturing the screen is a secret one. We are told by the inventor that the plate is of special glass, treated on both sides. The effect is to bring out the picture 100 per cent. brighter, making the pictures easy on the eyes and the light of projection is not easily affected by other light, therefore, it allows more light to be had in the theater. The screens will be manufactured by the Moving Picture Screen Company of Shelbyville, Ind., and they are now ready to place same on the market.

The photograph on the left was made with the light of projection. Part of the screen was covered with a fold of bleached sheeting doubled, and the extra brilliance of the plain screen is noticeable. The increased light reflecting quality of the glass screen over the sheeting is more easily discernible in the photograph on the left. The dull portion in this was also covered with bleached sheeting doubled.

"THE PROOF OF THE PUDDING."

If any exhibitor has any doubts in his mind as to the "profit-increasing" power of the baby show attraction, let him pay a visit some evening to the Open Air Theater, at 138th street and Third avenue, New York City.

This is probably the largest airdome in New York and accommodates about three thousand people. The baby show contest is now in progress, with sixty contestants striving for the handsome prizes, and this contest has attracted such widespread attention and interest that every seat is filled each night before the show commences.

The Novelty Slide Company, of New York, promoters of baby show contests, are furnishing all the necessary slides and supplies for this contest.

They shall be pleased to mail full particulars concerning the baby show to all readers interested.

COMING HEADLINERS.

"The Prince and the Pauper," an elaborately staged rendering of Mark Twain's famous story, to be issued by the Edison Company on August 3, is the first of a series of art films that is announced by this concern. The prelude will be a specially posed picture by Mark himself, which shows that the production in pictures of his story has been done with his full consent. Our authority for this statement is "The Edison Kinetogram," a neatly printed and well-edited bi-monthly bulletin, which will be hereafter issued from the Edison works and mailed free to all interested exhibitors and exchanges.

"The Leopard Queen," a full reel subject, to be released August 12 by the Selig Polyscope Company, is heralded to be one of the most wonderful pictures ever issued by that company—and that is saying a good deal. Elaborate five-colored posters have been prepared to adequately advertise this film, which is sure to be a money-getter, and we believe that the Selig Company will furnish them free to exhibitors.

The next two Biograph issues may safely be billed as special attractions. "A Strange Meeting" is a sermon in itself which should be seen by those ministers of the gospel who agitate against the Sunday moving picture show on general principles, but who do not trouble to visit them to judge of their harmless if not moral and educational value. Such pictures as "A Strange Meeting" deserve the widest circulation. Their next issue, "The Mended Lute," is an Indian story full of scenic and dramatic beauties.

THE WILDER WEST.

The remarks on another page in regard to Wild West pictures prompts us to quote from a letter just received from Lewis H. Moomaw, president and manager of the World Film Mfg. Co., of Portland, Ore. Says he: "We have had three serious accidents this week. In our picture, 'An Hour of Terror,' a military drama, our 'heavy,' during a sabre duel, received a painful cut across the face which will mark him for life. In our picture, 'A Game for a Life,' a cowboy's horse fell back upon him while climbing a dangerous precipice. It was necessary to remove him to the hospital, and I fear the boy is hurt pretty bad. While some of the other riders were making a mad rush up a hill, the leader's horse fell and three horses fell over him. He escaped with many bruises and cuts. The producer we have is very reckless in picking out dangerous places, but he is surely staging the pictures and they are the call of the West. The Eastern buyers want to wait until the films are old so they can buy prints at a reduced price. We have one price, and no matter if we had twenty prints left we would stick to that price. We are selling our back prints in Germany and England and find a ready market. I am in favor of an independent movement and expect to be in New York shortly to see what can be done towards bringing about a closer community of interests." You fellows that are kicking over artificial Western scenery in your pictures, here is the chance to get the real thing.

COURTS RULE AGAINST SUNDAY SHOWS.

The fight made by the Rev. Thomas McLoughlin of the Church of the Blessed Sacrament of New Rochelle against moving picture shows being allowed to be open Sunday was won Tuesday when Supreme Court Justice Joseph Morchauser at White Plains handed down a decision dissolving a temporary injunction which the moving picture proprietors had obtained restraining the police from interfering with them. Last Sunday Father McLoughlin spoke at all the masses against the Sunday shows and he advised all the members to do all they could to close them. Justice Morschauser holds the shows were illegal. The police of New Rochelle say that if the proprietors of the shows attempt to open next Sunday they will close the places.

No attempts were made last Sunday to open the moving picture shows in Buffalo. Corporation Counsel Desbecker's move in securing a stay of procedure in an order from Justice Hooker of Fredonia had its desired effect, but Attorney Eugene L. Falk stated that he would attempt to have the order quashed this week. He will serve a notice to vacate the stay which will be returnable the middle of this week in the form of a show cause order.

EXCLUSIVE FILM SERVICE.

From our foreign contemporaries we have learned that Mr. McMillan, of the Exclusive Film Service, Chicago, has been very successful in Europe in his quest for exclusive film subjects. He has gathered up a large supply of film which has never been exhibited in this country, and arranged for a continuous supply. The first shipment is now in Chicago, and the Exclusive Film Service Company are open to deal with one theater in each city.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE MENDED LUTE.—Moving picture stories based on the life and customs of the American aboriginals have ever been attractive, and we conscientiously doubt if there has ever been a more intensely interesting subject presented than this Biograph production which, indeed, is a masterpiece. Much thought and time were given the many details, and we may claim that as to costumes, manners, and modes of living, it is more than reasonably accurate, these details having been supervised by an expert in the matter. The Dakotas or Sioux Indians, when first visited by Jean Duluth in 1680, who claimed their country for the French, inhabited what is now North Minnesota, but were driven during subsequent Indian wars as far South as the present Sioux City, when in the war of 1812 they were allies of Britain. The incidents of our story are laid in the neighborhood of Spirit Lake, Ia., just previous to the outbreak, the first of which occurred in 1854, when Lieut. Grattan and his force were killed, the failure of the government to meet stipulations in land purchases being the cause. Owing to their roving, migratory nature, they were tent or tepee dwellers, expert horsemen and canoeists. Despite the general impression, they are highly emotional and poetic; yet with superlative power of dissemhling, and the quaint love scenes herein depicted are unique in the extreme. Pretty little Rising Moon, the daughter of Chief Great Elk Horn, is wooed by Little Bear, and we meet them first at the foot of Snake Falls where they plight their troth to the music of the rumbling waters. Little Bear's worldly possessions are slim, and Great Elk Horn rejects his meagre offerings in favor of Standing Rock's rich gifts, and so Rising Moon is taken away by him to his wigwam, where she is left while her husband that is to be goes hunting. Taking advantage of his absence she steals away to the forlorn heart of her own choice, Little Bear, before it is too late. Standing Rock returning and finding her gone at once surmises the truth, and gathering his companions together, starts in pursuit. Little Bear and Rising Moon hearing their approach endeavor to make their escape. Pushing their way towards the river bank, with Standing Rock and his braves following, they leap into a canoe and are soon dashing along in the swift current of the mountain stream, which is in places the most dangerous of rapids. The feat seems ominous, but is safely accomplished, and was worthy of a better fate than capture, which they were later. Death of both is the reward, and they are bound together to this end. The ire of Standing Rock demanded more than mere death, so he proceeds to taunt and torture his rival. This is received with such stoicism by Little Bear, that Standing Rock is amazed to the point of admiration for the brave's fortitude, and not only cuts the cords that bind him, but bestows upon him the Eagle Feather, the highest honored gift to the brave, and bids he and Rising Moon to go and may they be happy. The subject as a whole is a combination of poetical romance and dramatic intensity, the canoe chases being the most picturesque and thrilling every shown. Length, 996 feet.

A STRANGE MEETING.—"Rebuke me not in Thy wrath, O Lord; neither chasten me in Thy hot displeasure, for Thine arrows stick fast in me, and Thy hand presseth me sore."—Psalm 38:i, ii. How often we hear some poor unfortunate carrying out this penitential appeal, and how efficacious it is, for there is always the light that shineth in the darkness. Always is the beacon of righteousness shining to guide the weary wayfarers, and at least once in a lifetime it flashes with alluring brilliancy. This occasion occurs at the opening of our story for the heroine, Mary Rollins. In a Bowery dance-hall we find her associated with those poor souls who walk in the Valley of the Shadow of Death. One of their number is a youth whose mother appears and tries to get him away from the place, but appeals are in vain and she goes to the little mission, where she finds Rev. John Stanton, the pastor, who is the good shepherd willing to seek the lost one. Stanton's entrance in the dance hall occasions vile derision from the mob, and, indeed, they would have assaulted him, had he not cowed them by an exhibition of his forced aggressiveness. Here he meets Mary, through whose glance he sees a pure soul which is being forced into the quagmire of crime by conditions. Before leaving with the boy, Stanton hands around cards on which is printed Psalm 23. These lines impress her so deeply that she is drawn to the little mission to hear the words of encouragement preached by the kindly spirited Mr. Stanton. How strongly do the words of holy writ, "Let them be ashamed who transgress without cause," appeal to her when she arrives at her home to find herself compelled to join her father and brother in a burglary. The injunction "Thou shalt not steal" never seemed so terrible as now. However, she must bow to the inevitable and go. By singular coincidence the place selected are the apartments of Rev. Mr. Stanton. Mary and her brother are in the room when surprised by the minister, who was at first inclined to hand them over to the police, but that something good in her sad face made him desist, and he allows them to go. Mary had secured the minister's watch and chain, with which she retraces her steps and returns. Mr. Stanton takes this opportunity to plead with her to give up her present life and go the better way, and although she breathes the prayer, "Show me Thy ways, O Lord; teach me Thy paths," she feels how weak she is, but the good man encourages her by telling her of the omnipotence of God's grace, so she fights on, and we finally find her in the little chapel, her arms stretched forth and face upturned with the promise, "I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever," thus ending one of the most beautiful picture subjects ever produced. Length, 967 feet.

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.—To our friend, William Shakespeare, we owe apologies only for the title of this amusing little skit, and great humorist that he was, we do not think he could have developed a funnier situation than is in this story.

Strange things happen in the course of marital bliss and it is not infrequent that the merest trifles cause the most turmoil. Our friend, Jones, loves his wife and carries her photograph in his overcoat pocket. In leaving a restaurant one evening, he accidentally exchanges overcoats with a gentleman who occupies the next table. The coats being identical in style, are easily exchanged without the owners' knowledge.

When Jones arrives home that evening, wifey goes through his pockets and brings out a photograph. But to her horror it is not her photograph but that of another woman. A similar discovery is made by the other man's wife.

Some interesting things happen when Mrs. Jones starts out to find the hussey whose likeness her husband carries, and when they finally meet there is such a stormy scene that a policeman, who luckily hoves in sight, separates them and takes them to the police station.

The husbands of the jealous wives are now sent for and the discovery of the exchange of the overcoats is made. All end happily and the Jones and Browns become fast friends.

This is a good story, overflowing with comical situations and will delight your audience.

THE MUSTARD PLASTER.—In this picture a man with a cold, an advising friend and two mustard plasters are the principal actors. Of course the star of the comedy are the mustard plasters.

A man suffering from a severe cold is advised by a well meaning friend to place mustard plasters on his chest and back, which will, his friend tells him, quickly relieve him of his cold.

The mustard plasters are purchased, and the man proceeds to do as the directions state, but he did not hargain for the hot time he was going to have. As luck would have it he picked out a very hot one and it immediately begins to have its effect.

He throws himself in front of the fire hose; he tries to cool off on the back of a sprinkling wagon. Nothing relieves him until finally he spots a cold storage warehouse, rushes in and goes into one of the refrigerators, and while he is freezing to death, two workmen rush in and relieve him of the mustard plasters. He then swears that he would much rather have a cold than mustard plasters on his back and chest.

WHEN THE FLAG FALLS.—It is the time of the Revolutionary War. An important message must be carried to General Sigel. A soldier boy is entrusted with this. He asks his sweetheart to sew the message in the seat of his trousers and writes a decoy message which he puts in the lining of his cap in case of any accident overtaking him.

He is captured by a Hessian foraging party. The decoy message is found and he is condemned as a spy to be shot "When the flag falls." His sweetheart learns of his predicament. She comes to him with the message of hope and cheer. She draws the bullets from the guns and replaces them with blanks. Her lover asks that his body be given to her to be buried. When the flag falls the guns are fired.

He drops as prearranged. The Lieutenant only slightly examining the body, permits the young girl to cart it away. Thus the lover is saved. The message is delivered to General Sigel. The enemy is routed and the Americans are victorious. General Sigel thanks heartily the brave patriots. He joins their hands in wedlock, then takes a medal off his breast and pins it on the girl. Length, 910 feet.

HIS LITTLE GIRL.—Lou, a young bachelor, receives the following letter from his friend, Hawkins:

Dear Lou:—I must leave at once for Europe on important business and not knowing where to put her, I send you my little girl to watch over her until I return. I know she won't be any great trouble to you. Thanking you in advance, hoping to see you after my return, I remain,

Your dear old friend,
EMMETT HAWKINS.

Lou rings for his butler and together they go out and buy the necessary things for the "little girl." Pretty soon they return loaded with toys of every kind, clothes and baby furniture, when the bell rings and the "little girl" arrives. Imagine Lou's surprise when a young lady of 18 enters, "Hawkins' little girl."

Three months hardly passed when Lou calls "his" girl "my little girl" and after another year, when old Hawkins returns from his trip to Europe, the happy couple present to Grandpa "our little girl." Length, 535 feet.

SHE WOULD BE AN ACTRESS.—Mrs. Young-wife has become stage struck. She purchases a book, "How to Become a Great Actress," and soon imagines she is ready for her debut. The husband tries in vain to bring her to her senses and follows her in disguise.

He breaks up her first performance, thrashes a too ardent admirer and tells her he will get a divorce. She prefers to sacrifice her "art" to her darling hubby and peace reigns forever. Length, 425 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

FANTASTIC HEADS.—This laugh provoking picture is a marvel in trick photography and being beautifully colored it makes a most entertaining subject. In the first picture we are confronted by a bevy of beautiful dancing girls who trip the light fantastic in a most graceful manner, and form many beautiful tableaux. Suddenly they all disappear from our view, and in their stead we see a headless man appear in the background. He does not lack a cranium very long for it appears as though he had quite a copious assortment. All sorts of heads, some beautiful and others extremely homely and amusing, appear upon the shoulders and afford no end of good amusement Length, 311 feet.

THE BUTLER'S TRICK.—A man and his wife go away to the country, leaving their beautiful town house in charge of their officious butler. Shortly after their departure, the servant thinks of a good scheme whereby he can make a few extra dollars. He puts an advertisement in the paper, stating that the house is "to let," and soon he has a prospective tenant upon the scene. The latter who has just been married, rents the house and soon installs his happy bride as mistress of the beautiful establishment. They are just about settled in their new quarters, and have retired for the night, when unexpectedly, the owners return. Upon entering the place the latter, at a glance, realizes that something strange has taken place since his departure. He listens at the chamber door and upon hearing voices, is convinced that there are burglars in the house. His frightened wife nearly has hysterics, but the man manages to calm her, and after putting her in another room, he hides in a closet to await developments. Soon the young couple come into the room and the owner of the place pounces upon them, and for a few moments there is a lively scuffle. Soon however, the contestants manage to cool off long enough to explain matters, and then there is a lengthy discussion as to who is boss of the house. At this juncture the butler puts in an appearance and admits his guilt, whereupon the enraged people give him a well deserved beating for his part in the affair. Length, 574 feet.

THELLYS' HEART.—The scenes of this beautifully mounted and artistically colored picture are laid in ancient Rome, where we see the young hero Ithis present himself before the father of pretty Thellys and ask for the latter's hand in marriage. Thellys enters the place upon the arm of her lover Cyclon, but as her father has given her to Ithis, she is torn from the side of Cyclon, and be is ejected from the place. When Thellys is presented to Ithis she will have none of him, but upon being threatened by her father, she reluctantly consents to go away with her new lover. Arriving at the latter's castle he tries in every manner to make love to Thellys, but she will not allow him to come near her. Finally Ithis gives up in despair and seeks diversion in gambling and carousing. His former sweetheart Fahtima tries to win back his affections, but he is so desperately in love with Thellys that he will not notice Fahtima. Finally the latter disgising herself as a man comes into the gambling den and throws dice with Ithis, who is unlucky at every turn and loses everything. Fahtima, desirous of having Thellys out of the way, proposes to Ithis that he stake Thellys' love in the game of chance. Ithis accepts the proposition, and although he plays a careful game, luck seems against him, and he loses. Disheartened, Ithis rushes out of the place leaving Thellys in the power of Fahtima, who immediately directs one of her servants to put an end to the poor girl. She is given over to a gruff fellow who leads her out of the palace, to a lonelyspot in the woods where, not having the courage to kill her, he ties her to a tree and leaves her to her fate.

Her old lover Cyclon, who has become a wanderer since the loss of his sweetheart, happens to pass by and to his great astonishment discovers his lady love. He rescues her and the happy couple are once more united by the power of love. Length, 968 feet.

THE TRAGEDY OF MEUDON.—Here is another example of a high class motion picture abounding in dramatic interest which is offered with such vitality and intelligence of purpose that it will take its place among the other art films as one of the greatest achievements in the history of the silent drama.

The dramatic thread of this little tragedy is the jealousy of a woman toward her new daughter-in-law, and the artistic manner in which the different characters are portrayed is indeed commendable. The artists who play the respective parts are Hme. Alme Tessandier of the Comedie Francaise, Mr. Varennes of the Theater Rejane and Mlle Barat of the Athenes, Paris, France.

This film production is an exceedingly clever handling of a novel idea, showing how two gypsies, who stole a little girl's Shetland Pony, were identified by a Kodak picture, traced to their camp and captured. The acting of the little heroine and her prize pony is positively startling in its realism. This production is an attractive feature for ladies and children.

A STRANGE MEETING

The Most Powerful Sermon Ever Depicted.

Not since the production of "A Salvation Army Lass" has there been a film story as impressing as this latest Biograph subject. It clearly shows the efficacy of the endeavors of one of the pastors of a little mission in the slums of New York. Rev. John Stanton conducts services in a small chapel, and during one of his deeds of charity meets Mary Rollins, a victim of circumstances, her father and brother being crooks, forcing her to take a part in their nefarious work. A burglary is arranged and by coincidence the place selected is the home of Stanton. They are surprised, and Mary is again brought face to face with he who is eventually her rescuer. The picture closes with her redemption. It is unquestionably one of the most beautiful and touching subjects ever produced.

Moving picture stories based upon the life and customs of the American aboriginals have ever been attractive, and we conscientiously doubt if ever there has been a more interesting subject presented than this Biograph production, which, indeed, is a masterpiece. The opening scene reveals the interior of a butcher shop in the town of Meudon, France, where we see the industrious young butcher attending to his customers, while his mother, a comely woman past the prime of life, acts in the capacity of cashier. The general aspect of the place reveals an air of tranquillity and happiness, until the son who has recently been married, brings his young bride into the place. The mother up to this time has had no rival in her boy's affections, and now when the older woman sees part of the work in the little shop being assigned to the young woman, she becomes insanely jealous. From that moment the mother-in-law treats the young woman with utter contempt and makes her life unbearable, although the elder woman is diplomatic enough to act kindly toward her rival when in the presence of her son. The two woman have many disagreeable scenes, and things reach such a serious state that the young bride is forced to complain to her husband of his mother's harsh treatment, and threatens that unless the situation is altered he will be compelled to choose between his mother and wife.

The young man who is deeply grieved and horrified upon hearing the sad news, remonstrates with his mother, and tries to point out the proper course to pursue which will increase the happiness and content of all parties concerned. His talk with the old lady has very little effect, for she has made up her mind to cherish a hatred for the young woman who has supplanted her (as she imagines) in the affections of her only son.

The feud between the rivals finally reaches a serious climax. One day they are left alone in the shop, and the younger woman attempts to assume the duties in the cashier's desk. The old woman imperiously commands her to leave the place, and when the latter refuses to obey, the enraged mother-in-law attacks her. There is a lively scuffle between the two women, in which the younger one fares badly.

The next day while some peasants are at work in the field, one of the party finds the dead body of the young bride hidden under a hay stack. An alarm is sounded, and soon the whole village is upon the scene of the crime. One of the men finds a large butcher knife, the deadly instrument with which the crime was committed, and recognizing it as the property of the dead woman's husband, naturally, the blame of the terrible crime is at once thrown upon him. The lifeless form of the woman is carried to her late home, and when the bereaved husband is accused of the deed, he nearly goes frantic. But as the evidence points towards his guilt, he is led away to pay the penalty of the crime. His guilty mother stands by and lets the officers take the young man without uttering a word in his defense.

The next scene we see the old woman who has completely broken down beneath the weight of a haunted mind, and her guilty conscience has been to much for her and she is suffering from a stroke of paralysis.

Before her eyes she continually sees the vision of the crime, and unable to bear up under the terrible anguish longer, she makes a confession of her guilt, when she receives a letter from her boy in which he tells her that he is condemned to die for a crime of which he is innocent. The guilty woman calls for a piece of paper upon which she writes, "My son is innocent, it was I who killed Charlotte." The confession is carried to the prison just as the young man is about to ascend the gallows. From that moment he is a free man, and is allowed to return to his home, where he finds his mother in an extremely weak physical condition. The officers come to arrest the guilty persons, but too late; she has passed beyond the power of a mortal jurisdiction and entered upon that spiritual pathway which leads to the distant home where all are judged fairly. Length, 951 feet.

THE TWO PIGEONS.—This pair of young lovers whose romantic lives form the interesting subject of this richly colored picture, are seen in their simple little home where the devoted youth showers his attentions upon the simple little maiden. One day they have a slight disagreement, and while the youth is absent, another more gallant Romeo comes and induces the maiden to flee with him to the splendor of gay life which his riches can procure. The impulsive girl leaves a note on the table telling her lover that she will never see him again, after which she goes away with her new admirer.

The axiom, "All is not gold that glitters," becomes a stern reality, before many days have been spent in her new surroundings, and her tired and weary heart yearns for the pure love of the noble youth who she cast aside for one who soon proves himself unworthy of such a pure devotion. One day she finds her new lover in the company of another woman and is spellbound upon hearing him tell her the same tale of love which she, herself, has so often heard emanating from the same false lips. Enraged with jealousy, the maiden casts the many beautiful gifts at the false lover's feet and after denouncing him, she flees from the place.

Wandering back to the old familiar scenes she finds her first and only true love still waiting for her return, and feeling satisfied that the splendor of riches are transitory, she is satisfied to devote the rest of her life to the one who loves her truly. The youth overjoyed at her safe return gladly forgets the past and accepts the penitent maiden as his future wife. Length, 590 feet.

ARABIAN PILGRIMAGE.—This is a wonderful scenic film which will prove very interesting and beneficial as an educational subject. Like all such pictures it gives the public the privilege of seeing at close range the different inhabitants of the far off countries and gives them an opportunity to study the peculiar customs of the strange people. This picture shows a pilgrimage of the Mohammedans to Mecca and it is an inspiring sight to witness the devotion of the Arabs to the memory of their great prophet. Length, 295 feet.

BEFORE THE MAST.—John Bardon, an old fisherman, has an only daughter, who is in love with Jack Turner, a young and robust lumberman, with little else to offer her than a pair of willing and honest hands. Now the old man favors Rufus Black, the skipper of a four-masted schooner, and so informs Minnie, his daughter. But that headstrong young lady takes a violent dislike to Black and will have nothing to do with him, much to her father's chagrin and the skipper's disappointment.

The opening scene of the picture shows the meeting of the old fisherman and Black, in which the latter asks for Minnie's hand. While the two men are discussing the matter, big Jack Turner and Minnie are spooning at the little home. Jack leaves, however, just in time to avoid meeting his rival, who comes in person to advance his suit. Little dreaming that his daughter would refuse to marry so great a personage as the captain of a ship, old Bardon is astounded when he sees how quickly Minnie spurns his friend's offer. Believing that the proper way to subject his daughter to his will is to deprive her of her freedom until she listens to reason, the old fisherman proceeds to lock her in her room, much to that young lady's wrath and in spite of her mother's entreaties. "She'll come to her senses soon," says the old man, as he bids the rejected suitor good-day and prepares to set about his afternoon's work.

He is hardly out of the room before Betty Barr, one of the neighbor's girls, enters on a borrowing mission, and hearing the sobs of the imprisoned girl through the thin partition, she unlocks the door to find out what the trouble is. Minnie soon acquaints her with her sad predicament, and following Betty's advice, writes a note to Jack, telling him to liberate her and arrange for their marriage that very night. The good-hearted Betty promises to bear the message herself, which she does, putting it into the hands of her friend's sweetheart, who loses no time in setting about to arrange his plans for the elopement that evening.

When Black calls to see if Minnie has reconsidered her determination, he stumbles onto the lovers as they are making away from the house, Minnie being rescued by means of a rope from the second story window. He at once gives the alarm, and accompanied by the irate father, follows the couple to the home of a minister nearby. They are too late, though, for the marriage ceremony is under way. Finding it useless to make any further stand against the happy pair, old Barton wisely forgives them and tenders them his blessing. But not so with the angry and disappointed rival. His cherished desire has been frustrated and he goes away nursing his wrath and burning with a thirst for revenge. He broods over the matter for several days, then hits upon a plan to satisfy his hatred for Jack and his bride.

His ship about to sail, he fixes up a scheme with his mates to lay for Jack and bring him aboard the boat by force. That being accomplished, they would weigh anchor, and once out at sea this rival would be completely in his power and subject to any abuse and humiliation they might see fit to inflict upon him.

The plan is carried out as arranged, and soon poor Jack is dragged, fighting every inch of the way, on deck, and then bound hand and foot and lowered into the hold, where for days he is kept a prisoner, tortured by the thought of his weeping bride alone in her misery, with no knowledge of his fate or whereabouts.

A month passes before he is brought up out of the darkness and given any kind of freedom, and then only to be put to work at the most menial of tasks and subjected to the direst treatment. At last, in desperation, he turns on his persecutor and refuses to be further driven. The brutal captain draws back to strike him with a capstan bar, when Jack's right arm straightens out and the bully is laid sprawling on the deck. Screaming with rage he orders the men to seize Jack and lash him to the mast. This they soon succeed in doing. His shirt is stripped from his back, and taking a "cat-o'-nine-tails," Black orders a burly seaman to lay it on until Jack yells for mercy. The whipping over, Jack's hands are untied—a fatal error on the skipper's part—for driven to madness by his wrongs, the desperate lumberman sails into his tormenters, and such is the fury of his onslaught that he sends most of them crashing to the deck, and with a yell of derision, plunges headlong over the side of the ship into the sea.

Jack is a good swimmer and is soon lost to view of those on board the ship, who give him up as gone to "Davy Jones." A small fishing smack in the distance catches the swimmer's eye and he makes for it. Taken aboard he relates his story, and for some weeks is dependent upon the kind-heartedness of the simple fisher folk, who take him in and share with him their magre stores. At last a vessel bound for the home shore is sighted and Jack bids his friends farewell.

We are now taken to the Bardon home, where Minnie, who is just recovering from a long illness caused by her husband's absence, is sitting in the old armchair enjoying the sunshine. A shadow falls across her vision, and looking up she gazes into the face of the hated Black, who has come to renew his suit, thinking that of course his rival is at the bottom of the sea.

While he is offering his false sympathy, a shout in the distance is heard, and an answering cry which brings the blood surging into Minnie's heart and pales the swarthy face of the hypocrite. She staggers to her feet and is about to fall backward, when she is clasped in the strong arms of her returned husband and crushed to his heart. As though he had encountered one from the grave, Rufus Black is paralyzed with terror and dashes away, never more to be seen in the little harbor of Glen Cove.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE BUGLE CALL.—The story opens in a little Northern village in 1861, where soldiers and their friends are clustered about in the village square. Evidently a company is about to start for the front. The hero, a bugler, and his sweetheart stroll on and are observed in front. He puts a ring upon her finger and both are plainly making mutual promises. The time comes to start, the girl, who holds the bugle on her lap, bangs it proudly on her lover's shoulder and as he tears himself away she points to it, to the flag which is waving overhead and to herself, three promises to which he must be faithful. As the company marches away she waves good-bye until they have disappeared, then yields to her grief. One year elapses and the scene changes to the encampment of the Union soldiers at a gloomy period of the war. The dejected men mope about while their comrades are dying with fever. It is night and the hero is sitting alone in front of his tent discouraged with his surroundings. An old negro passes by wearing a coat and hat of a civilian. He is carrying a spade and following the bearers of a dead soldier. A temptation comes to the hero, and we observe it thrown as a vision on the screen. He sees himself waylaying the old darkey in an obscure spot, buying his civilian's clothes, hiding his bugle and his own uniform and deserting. The vision fades as the old darkey returns. The hero bargains with him for the coat and hat and is about to take them when there comes to him a vision of the day a year before when he parted from his sweetheart on the village green. He sees her as she was that day and hears her voice telling him to be true to his duty and to her. A realization of his shame comes to him, he drops the coat and hat with loathing and, with renewed determination to endure his sharships, throws himself in the door of his tent to sleep. The scene now changes to the following morning. A stir is observed in the Confederate lines, a Federal picket observes the activity and is soon galloping desperately to carry the information to the Union forces. A group of officers are holding a consultation in front of the hero's tent as the picket gallops up and tells the news. The young man starts from his sleep, receives hurried orders from the officers and carefully blows his bugle. The camp is astir with preparations for the battle. The scene now changes to the battlefield. The Confederates are driving the Union forces before them. The Union soldiers are apparently routed. Suddenly, however, the hero appears among them and tries to rally them. He blows his bugle, is joined by other soldiers and rush forward. The sound of the bugle causes the Federal troops to cease their flight. The bugler is wounded and falls motionless upon the field. Reverting to the Northern village, the people are receiving news of the battle. The heroine carefully looks over the list of killed and wounded, finds her sweetheart's name and regardless of protest, starts for the front. She goes at once to the army hospital, where she finds her sweetheart weak, but on the road to recovery. General Grant appears and shakes the hero's hand. He intimates that there is someone else who is waiting to see him and the heroine is brought in and she and her lover are reunited. Length, 565 feet.

THE TRUANT; Or. How Willie Fixed His Father.—Willie and his father and mother are eating breakfast. Father, inclined to be a grouch, is hustling the boy off to school, and he leaves grumbling. Father looks after him and shortly afterward follows. He comes upon his son playing marbles, gives him a sound spanking and again hurries him off to school. In passing the factory, where his father is employed, Willie sees a sign recently put up to the effect that all employees coming late will hereafter be discharged. The boy thinks a moment, then hits upon a plan to get even with Dad for the chastisement just received. The next morning, watching his chance, Willie sets the clocks and also his father's watch back one hour. The family at breakfast eat leisurely, father leaves for his work, as he thinks, in plenty of time. At the factory office the clerks are busy at their work as the boss enters and asks about the missing clerk, and learning that he has not reported, writes a letter of discharge and lays it on father's desk. Dad finally arrives, bids his fellow clerks good morning and reads the letter in amazement. He looks at the clock, then at his watch and proceeds home to investigate. After a consultation the blame is attached to Willie and immediately search for him is begun. The boy eludes them for a while, then, realizing that escape is impossible and also what is in store for him, fills his pockets with screws, nails, etc. Papa finally gets Willie, starts to spank him and bruises himself on the hidden hardware. The joke is so good that the old man cannot keep from laughing any longer. He takes Willie to the office and explains about his son getting even for the spanking administered the day before. The boss appreciates the joke and gives father back his old position. Length, 461 feet.

A WOMAN'S WAY.—'Squire Chester, on his deathbed, leaves his property to be equally divided between his niece, Letty, a miniature painter, and his nephew, Julian, a young spendthrift, on condition that they marry. Julian, without knowing who she is, rescues his cousin from being run over. She, however, discovers his identity and willingly consents to the terms of the will. Julian indignantly refuses to marry any woman for money and will listen to no remonstrations. He gets terribly in debt, is pursued by bailiffs and is forced to leave his lodgings. Unconsciously he takes refuge in the same lodging house in which Letty lives. He is taken ill with fever and Letty nurses him back to health. He falls in love with her, marries her and, without knowing it, fulfills the terms of the will. He afterward willingly forgives the innocent deception practiced on him by Letty. Length, 865 feet.

THE PRINCE AND THE PAUPER.—Tom Canty, an intelligent and partly educated pauper boy, a beggar, the son of a ruffianly father, bore the strongest resemblance to the Prince of Wales.

One day Tom wandered near the palace gates. Too near, thought the guard on duty, for he cuffed him away, and Tom cried aloud under the sting of his blows.

Edward, the prince, was in the palace grounds near the gate, and, hearing the outcries, made inquiry as to the cause. A courtier brought the answer.

Edward had a gentle heart. There was misery in the cries of the lad outside. He ordered him brought within to console him. The prince's word was law. The pauper boy was brought before him. Never having conversed with a boy of the streets before, Edward retired with him to a secluded room and there both noticed the resemblance between them through an accidental joint glance in a mirror.

The thing suggested the boyish prank that they change clothes for the moment. No sooner said than done. Tom pranced about in the prince's royal raiment and truly royal he looked, while the prince masqueraded as the pauper boy and looked Tom Canty to the life.

At this moment Tom spoke of the unnecessary brutality of the guard. In a flash, forgetting his attire, the prince was off to chastize the guard. Alone and with one whom he thought the pauper boy, the guard was not gentle. He pitched the prince in beggar's rags into the street.

Wildly the prince proclaimed himself, but a jeering crowd drove him away. Before he could return he encountered the elder Canty and was hauled off, despite his protests, to their hovel. Here he was beaten because he had begged no money, and later was dragged off to join a band of roving rogues.

From these he was rescued by a poor knight, Miles Herndon, and the two became fast friends, though the knight laughed at the supposed beggar's pretentions to royalty.

Meanwhile Tom had been having many strange adventures at the palace, where he was supposed to be the prince. His singular conduct caused an impression among the couriers that he was demented.

King Henry VIII., Edward's father, died at this juncture, and here truly was a fateful circumstance; for the pauper boy was hailed king of England, and, though in agony of mind over it, was about to be crowned.

The ceremony was in actual occurrence in Westminster Abbey when the prince succeeded in gaining admittance. Loudly he proclaimed himself and would have been struck down by the soldiery as a traitor had it not been for Tom himself.

He was the first to acknowledge his rightful king, and it was through his aid that Edward was enabled to step to the throne and receive the crown that in a few moments more would have been placed on the pauper boy's head. Length, 1,070 feet.

LOCHINVAR.—Sir Walter Raleigh's romantic story of the love that laughed at more than locksmiths, and to which even castle walls and haughty fathers were no bar, is told by the Edison Company with a wealth of scenic vesture and old Scottish atmosphere that brings out all its picturesque details.

We see young Lochinvar, who "rode out of the West," sending one of his retainers disguised as a peddler, to the fair Ellen, who, much against her will, has been betrothed to Douglas.

The retainer brings her a message of hope; yet the eve of her forced marriage arrives and no Lochinvar. But as the marriage festivities are in progress our hero appears before the castle walls and asks permission to congratulate Douglas.

After being disarmed he is admitted, and then during the one and last dance which he is permitted to have with Ellen, he suddenly seizes a sword from the wall, takes her in his arms, and before any one can stop him, breaks one of the high windows and carries her down the castle wall.

His swift horse is waiting for him below, and with Ellen in his arms he dashes off, hotly pursued by her father, Douglas and a castle guard.

Because his horse is the best in the land, the lovers succeeded in reaching the monastery so far ahead of their pursuers that when the latter arrive the ceremony has been performed and their pursuit is in vain.

The presentation of this story is full of vitality, life and good red blood, and one's heart must beat faster when watching its unfolding and its happy termination at the altar. Length, 790 feet.

THE TOBACCO EDICT.—In the early days of New York, when this whole district was known as New Netherlands, an early Governor, familiarly known as "William the Testy," issued an edict against the smoking of tobacco. The story of the effect this edict had on the burghers of the town is shown in Boughton's famous painting, but the real reason for the Governor's issuing the edict has never been made known until now. The rebellion of the burghers against the edict and their coming in a formal body to smoke out the Governor on his own doorstep is, in the Edison picture, supplemented by the story, understandable to every smoking man, of why the Governor sent out this unusual proclamation.

Old Dutch New York, with its quaint houses, costumes and characters, is reproduced here with human and comic touches that will appeal to any audience. Length, 199 feet.

THE SENTINEL ON DUTY.—France is in a state of war. Volunteers are needed. Ardent young patriots flock to the recruiting stations to offer themselves to their motherland. Among them, more eager and ardent than any, is young Pierre Daupin, whose father, as a youth, had fought in many battles for the tri-colored banner.

Upon donning his uniform, Pierre goes to bid farewell to his parents. He presents a fine appearance. They are proud of him, but his mother is filled with gloomy forbodings regarding his safety.

Pierre tries to cheer her up, but with little success. Both his father and mother bestow their blessings on him. Then his father, with much tenderness, presents him with a "repeater" watch, which has been in the Dupin family for years. The old soldier tells his son to cherish it, and never let it run down, as it was started with the old family clock many years before, and both have run absolutely together.

He goes on to tell Pierre there is a legend in the family to the effect that if either the clock or watch should stop, the other would stop instantly and that such an event would announce dire disaster to the family. Pierre is solemnly abjured by his father to remember that as the home clock strikes twelve, his watch will also strike the hour, and at that time particularly he must think of his parents at home, for then they will be dreaming of him and praying for his safety. He departs with their blessings and sad eyes watch the beginning of his journey.

Now at the front, we find Pierre assigned to sentry duty. It is night, and the hour approaches twelve. Pierre's thoughts turn homeward as he consults his gift and noting the hour he feels that the old parents are at this moment looking at the home clock, thinking of their boy. So absorbed does he become in these bitter-sweet reflections that he does not observe a small band of the enemy creeping towards him. They quietly advance within gun shot and fire at the unsuspecting Pierre, ending his life and shattering the watch.

At home, the parents are watching the clock as it approaches the hour of twelve. It suddenly stops, and the mother's heart tells her that her boy is dead. The father cannot help but agree with her, so firmly rooted is his belief in the legend of the watch and the clock. Taking down the family Bible, he comforts the grief-stricken mother with the words, "The Lord gave and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Length, 453 feet.

THE MORNING AFTER.—Dick Langdon, a gay old rounder, wakes up after a night spent in dalliance with the cup that cheers and inebriates. He feels as one is apt to feel at such a time, very much as if he had been beaten and drawn through a knothole. He has felt badly before, but to quite such a degree as this—never. The state of affairs frighten him so that when Wilkins, important butler, comes with his morning cup of coffee, Dick seeks comfort and advice from him.

He describes his symptoms vividly and at length, namely the dark-brown taste in his mouth, the extreme lameness of his back, the dizziness and all the other ills which are assailing him this dull, gray "morning after." Wilkins, ignorant and pompous, advises that he immediately consult a doctor, and the frightened Langdon hurries out of bed to secure for himself medical attention and advice.

He soon reaches a doctor's residence; after a brief consultation with himself, he enters. He is ushered into the waiting room, only to find himself in the presence of a crowd of ailing females, and by them he is informed that this physician is a specialist for "women only." The man knows this is no place for him, and tries a neighboring office. Here a worse state of affairs confronts him, for this medico is a specialist in mental diseases, and our hero, having no desire to be included in the number of gibbering idiots in the midst of whom he is thrust, beats a hasty retreat. At the next office he finds that only deaf people are treated, but being affected in a locality far removed from his hearing apparatus, he reluctantly has to take up his vain search for relief.

A lady doctor who treats children is, of course, no help for him, so at last realizing that he is in an age of specialists, he starts for home. On the way he passes a veterinary surgeon's establishment, and disgustedly enters, saying to himself that since he is "sick as a dog," he may as well be treated by a dog doctor. The veterinary at first informs him that he has come to the wrong place, but upon hearing the cause of Langdon's illness, suggests a glass of water. This has almost magical effect, so he asks for another glass, which completes the cure. Restored to his usual balance by simple common sense methods, when specialists failed to afford himself any relief, Langdon jauntily steps into the street again, and spying a pretty damsel, starts in pursuit. "Richard is himself again," and we surmise that he immediately resumes his usual round of pleasure. Length, 430 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine.)

THE TURNING POINT.—John, a temperate young farmer, is a dutiful husband and fond father of a sweet little girl. He is first seen at breakfast in the heart of his happy family which consists, in addition to his wife and daughter, of his old father and mother.

The meal finished we next see John industriously working in the fields with a group of other men. His companions are wont to refresh themselves often during the day by the use of spirits, which they secure from a peddler who brings a small keg to them in the fields.

John at first refuses to drink but becomes the object of several slighting remarks because of this, and finally after some persuasion is tempted into "taking just one drink."

The flavor and the stimulation please him. He indulges in another glass and soon becomes enamored of the possibilities of pleasure in the "flowing bowl."

We next see him with a group of rakish companions at the village inn. Several drinks make him forgetful of the little family at home and some time is spent in boisterous songs and stories. Unaccustomed to drinking John is soon to intoxicated to leave with his companions. He falls into a drunken slumber with his head upon the drinking table.

Now comes to his poisoned mind a dream which makes this hour a turning point in his life and forever cures him of the desire to feel the apparent joys of the habitual drinker.

In his dream he sees his happy family; into their presence he finally staggers in a beastly state of intoxication. The amazed and frightened wife gently remonstrates with him, but is abused by harsh word and finally brutally beaten. Crazed by drink he hurls his baby from his way and unheeding the reproaches and entreaties of his old father he carries on his orgy by further drinking.

He sees the heartbroken wife and frightened child flee from the farm. He watches them as they struggle painfully along a public road, suffering for want of food and care. Then the unhappy mother sinks dying beside the road and the heart-rending sobs of the little girl over the body of her only friend rouses him for an instant from his horrible dream. He attempts to throw off his drowsiness and the horror of his dream, but the wine is still too potent in his body and he again falls asleep.

Now he sees his life grow even more degraded. The home once so happy becomes the stage of an awful drama. He sees his feeble father trying to draw him away from his mad career of drinking. Unable to influence him for good the father reproaches him with his unworthy conduct. Stung by the rebuke and crazed by alcohol he grasps the old man's throat. He sees his father's struggles and death. He then sees his own arrest and the hours of labor spent in prison for his crime; sees himself one of a crew of low criminals working under guard in a stone quarry, planning with the associate outlaws for escape. He watches attempted flight, the pursuit by the guards, the solitary guard following him through the forest, the final hand to hand struggle between himself and the officer who overtakes him, a struggle in which he is pierced through the brain with a bullet and in awful agony dies.

John awakes greatly agitated, and observing before him the table covered with empty bottles knows he has made the first step in a path which may lead him through the very scenes and among the awful tragedies he has just watched in his dream.

With a strong effort of will he throws off, to an extent the effects of the liquor and makes his way to his home where the family are most anxiously awaiting his already tardy return.

He describes to his wife the events of the afternoon and his horrible dream. He then expresses his firm determination never to touch the poisoned cup again and to live only for his family's and his friends' good.

The story is clear, the photography perfect, the staging beautiful and the acting convincing. It is a picture the audience will mention to their friends. Length, 614 feet.

STRIPPING A FOREST IN WINTER.—Few Winter scenes can approach this picture for beauty, originality, picturesque effect and realistic scenes of an important Canadian industry.

This one phase of life in the great northwest is depicted with a thoroughness that leaves nothing to be desired, and the whole series, from start to finish, can be depended upon as a rare attraction.

The picture gives a truly wonderful trip through a vast forest of pine and shows perfectly many features of the life in the woods and the harvesting of timber.

We are first taken to the woodmen's camp of logs in the midst of the snow-covered hills and from there to groves of mammoth trees where we watch the felling of the monarchs of the forest. The photography is so perfect one almost hears the cracking of the limbs and the rush of the immense bodies as they crash to the earth.

The intense excitement of the incidents connected with hauling great loads of logs on runners down steep hills at breakneck speed, is seldom rivaled even in dramatic films, while fine variety is added to the subject by sections showing dog teams, traction engine sledges, piling and loading of logs, and finally the sliding of them into the river, down which they float to the mills, where they are cut into lumber.

The purely industrial scenes are set in such beautiful surroundings that the film becomes a wonderful study of artistic photography in the land of real Winter. The combination of art, education, and excitement is novel. Length, 387 feet.

Hello 1013 Gramercy.

Our Aim—
To give more than we promise.

I heard in New York the other day that moving picture operators are being treated shamefully when they call at some of the renting exchanges. So I'm going to make capital out of it by giving the finest and squarest treatment on earth to every man who enters any of my places. I make no bones of the fact that I want your business and your friendship whether you're the high mogul or the office boy. Come to me and I'll meet you nine-tenths of the way. My New York office at 111 East 14th Street has been getting a swell reception and is up to its esophagus in work. Drop in and talk things over, and for heaven's sake don't make the mistake of closing your house during summer.

WHY—The Motiograph is the best Motion Picture Machine

Because the Pictures are More Brilliant. The special patented Shutter is so arranged that it saves a lot of illumination otherwise lost.
Because Flicker is eliminated by the new patented Shutter.
Because the Pictures are Rock Steady when using a good film, and are restful to the eyes of your patrons. The result is because of accurate workmanship and excellence of design.
Because it has patented quick Rewind (one and one-half minutes) connected to main crank handle. No other similar.
Because it has the only perfect Fire-proof Shutter, automatic and absolutely reliable.
Because it has Enclosed Spiral Gears. They work smooth and wear longer.
Because it has a Perfect Take Up. Easy on the film and always reliable.
Because it has inclosed Framing Device. Wears longer, is quickly removed and patented.
Because it has "Wide Open" Lamp House, convenient for changing carbons, adjustment, etc.
Because it is absolutely Fireproof.
Because it has Double the Wearing Qualities possessed by other Machines.
Because it is almost Noiseless; runs more quiet than any other.
Because it has Heavy Pedestal Base, adjustable and patented.
Because it has more than 40 other points of special merit. Boston, New York, Chicago and San Francisco approved.

MR. J. H. HALLBERG,

Dear Sir:—It is now four months since we installed your direct current "HALLBERG ECONOMIZER" and machine has always given entire satisfaction.

It saves fully 50 per cent. on the current bill. The machine requires practically no attention whatever except occasional oiling and cleaning. Machine runs very quietly, current is very steady and machine does not heat up like a rheostat. I have the machine in the basement and the controlling apparatus is mounted in the operating booth. Thus I have perfect control over the light at all times.

The market is full of A. C. current savers, but M. P. managers having direct current have looked in vain for a current saver that could be used on D. C. Your D. C. "HALLBERG" Economizer will fill a long felt want, and I cannot recommend it too highly. Wishing you success, I am

Editorial.

The Props of a Staple Industry.

Two weeks ago we printed an account of the Motion Picture Patents Company and its work. The Patents Company is one of the most important, if not the most important, factors in the film world to-day, and for that reason we gave the article relating to it pride of place in a series which will follow in due course.

We projected that series of articles for a twofold reason: as a duty to the trade, as a duty to the reader. The policy of The Moving Picture World, as we have repeatedly pointed out, is to watch over the interests of the industry as a whole. And in carrying out that policy we are resolved to spare neither trouble nor expense. It is our determination to hand out even justice to all branches of the industry; to keep in touch with every progressive movement in it, and to bring home to the reader the importance of the manufacturing and other interests. These are the simple duties of a trade paper. Their reiteration should be unnecessary were it not for the foolish misrepresentations of envious and incompetent individuals, who have not sufficient intelligence to credit their fellow mortals with breadth of outlook.

Some day, perhaps, there will be a moving picture convention at Rochester, just as last week there was a gathering of the professional photographers there. Rochester, as we have pointed out elsewhere, is the cradle of the moving picture, for in the Flower City, as it is called, ninety per cent. of the world's supply of moving picture films is made. So why not a moving picture convention there, with manufacturers, renters, exhibitors and all interested in the newer and more wonderful branch of photography gathered together in harmony and concord?

This may look like a dream; but it is well within the bounds of practicability. The moving picture industry is young, but it is growing, and in its growth it is manifesting some irregularities which are the common attributes of youth. But with age a more settled state of things will supervene and then will come the harmony and the progress that characterize other industries.

The magnitude of the moving picture industry is best understood by a reference to the statistics that are given elsewhere. That such a great manufacturing concern as the Kodak Company, a company which during its phenomenal career has seldom erred in its vital calculations, should be always working at full pressure in its enormous plant is the best answer to the question whether the moving picture has come to stay, or whether it is only a passing fad.

Suggested Improvement For Reels.

There are many people, in fact the majority, who will encounter some difficulty day after day in their work without thinking out a remedy. We have ourselves experienced the trouble caused by the small diameter of the hub of the rewinding reel and have had the same increased in size, but did not think it of great importance until we received a communication from one of our readers, Richard P. Grieve, who suggests that an increased diameter to start the rewind has other advantages besides evening the strain on the take-up belt or chain. He says: "I frequently run films that are six weeks old, or older, and have noticed that the reel is always more 'rainy' at the beginning and at the end than in the middle. Now, as this rainy effect is caused by cracks or scratches in the emulsion that become filled with dust or grit and oil from the machine, I am of the opinion that its appearance first at the ends of the film is caused by the great strain in winding around the narrow axle of the reel, averaging about 1½ inches in diameter. My machine is an Edison one-pin movement and equipped with 12-inch magazines. All reels are 10-inch. Why not make the reels 12-inch, with an axle three or four inches in diameter? This would start the rewind on an axle large enough so as not to crack the emulsion and also provide room for a number of spring clips, so that if one is broken, another is handy to slip the leader under. The large diameter at the start would also give a more even and easier pull on the take-up, which is pretty strong on the start with an ordinary reel."

Mr. Grieve's suggestion is a good one and we would like to hear from other readers. Films frequently run over 1,000 feet, and in making up reels from short subjects it is often necessary to wind very tight to get the film within the protecting sides of the 10-inch reel, and while the general adoption of the 12-inch size would occasion some inconvenience and expense for a time, it seems to us that the change could be gradually made with benefit to all concerned.

Answering numerous inquiries as to whether back numbers of the Moving Picture World are obtainable, especially those containing the series of articles to operators and managers, we desire to say that we can supply all back numbers from the beginning of this series at 5 cents per copy, or new subscribers may order their subscription to begin with that number, which was Vol. IV., No. 15, of date April 10, 1909. Bound copies of this volume, up to June 30, are also on hand, the price of which is $2, postage or express prepaid.

The letter reproduced on another page is good proof of the value of the Moving Picture World as an advertising medium. Another advertiser who called at our office this week to renew his advertisement said that he had tried all the papers at great expense and had proved that there were only two which brought him results—the "World" and the "Billboard"—and that two-thirds of his replies came from the "World." Now we do not claim the large general circulation of the theatrical papers, but we do claim that more moving picture people read the "World" than all the other papers together. If you want to reach them, ADVERTISE IN THE WORLD.

GEORGE EASTMAN: AN APPRECIATION.

The following article by Mr. Thomas Bedding, F. R. P. S., was published in The Rochester Post Express of July 22:

"I have met George Eastman three times. Away back in the very early 'eighties I had heard of him as an ingenious engineer who had made what was then looked upon as a remarkable piece of mechanism—a device for coating glass plates with gelatino-bromide emulsion. Pioneer makers of dry plates used the coffee pot or the tea pot, supporting the plat on a pneumatic holder, while others poured out the sensitive fluid from jugs. An alert American mind say the preposterous primitiveness of this way of working, and so evolved the machine, the forerunner of those now in universal use.

"In 1885 Mr. Eastman and Mr. W. H. Walker invaded the British market with the Eastman-Walker roll holder, wherein sensitive negative paper was used on spools. There was a hard fight to break down the forces of conservatism, never so strong as in photography, but an Inventions Exhibition gave the device a prize, and so success came. Those were the days of the Eastman-Walker Photographic Materials Company; or translucent paper negatives, of bromide paper in packages of cut sheets. Neither the kodak nor celluloid film had yet appeared.

"But they came, and in 1893, when I first met George Eastman in the editorial room of the British Journal of Photography, though he was terse and incommunicative, I realized that I was in the presence of a man of achievement, a man of purpose, a man with one fixed idea in life—the kodak idea, the idea of assuring photography popularity among all classes the world over, by reducing it down in practice to its ultimate expression of simplicity.

"Four years later came the second meeting. This was in the magnificent suite of exhibition rooms known as The New Gallery, London, wherein the foremost displays of paintings and the like are shown throughout the year, and where the Royal Photographic Society still holds its great annual exhibition. On this occasion the walls of the five large galleries were covered with an amazing display of kodak prints in all sizes, styles, tones, colors and varieties of photographic treatment—a collection got together for the purpose of showing the almost illimitable wealth of power which these printing papers placed in the hands of photographers. I met Mr. Eastman in the center of the largest gallery. Brief and monosyllabic as ever, it seemed to me that he was sufficiently human to look around at the prints with quiet pride and satisfaction, as evidence that they marked yet another stage in the path of achievement which he had outlined for himself in the conquest of the photographic world: a world which he had set himself the task of interesting, instructing, educating in the beauty and simplicity of film photography.

"Colossal success had been the well-deserved good fortune of the Kodak Company by the time of my next meeting with the master mind of Rochester. This was in times of stress and crisis. The British photographic trade found itself unable to fall in line with the kodak policy; there were tradesmark suits; all was confusion, commotion, and, I am bound to add, insular narrow-mindedness in regard to American methods of doing business. For my sins, or for some other equally good or bad reason, it devolved upon me to approach Mr. Eastman with a view of ascertaining whether a modus vivendi could not be arrived at between the conflicting interests. It could not. The kodak productions took the market—the world's markets on their merits. Kodak legal rights must be respected. That, in effect, was the reply of the man who had made, by years of strenuous effort, kodak photography what it was—the world power of the black art, the most dazzlingly successful realization of a young American inventor's dream.

GEORGE EASTMAN

"All through the extraordinary career of George Eastman you see the same steady, unflinching, unfaltering purpose—the simplification and the popularization of photography. What success has rewarded his efforts is apparent to all to-day. It is world-wide. It is phenomenal. It is monumental. A last word: It is reasonable to conjecture that Mr. Eastman would have met an equally great success in any other line of work he chose to take up, for he has all the qualities of indomitability, masterfulness, faith in himself and his work, purpose, persistency, tenacity and tireless industry which place a man 'on top,' no matter what his lot may be on this small globe."

Exhibitors' Associations.

While the MOVING PICTURE WORLD has always advocated that the exhibitors should band together for mutual protection against trade hardships or political oppression, we have also advocated unanimity among the various organizations. Oppressive municipal ordinances last year called for the formation of exhibitors' associations in New York City and in Philadelphia, both of which have done good service and both should be perpetuated. But conditions have arisen which call for State associations in addition to the city associations. Every State should have its association of motion picture exhibitors to keep close watch upon attempts to pass oppressive State laws and delegates from these associations could convene once or twice a year to discuss general methods of business improvement. The city or local associations are only needed in the very large cities and should work in harmony with the State association. The members of the city association should also be members of the State association, and there is no occasion for any jealousy or clash between the two as has been threatened in this city and in Philadelphia. There is work for both, there is room for both, and, if their motives are right, there will exist such unanimity of purpose that harmony must prevail.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

CHAPTER XIII.—SETTING THE CARBONS.

Whether you are using A. C. or D. C. (alternating current or direct current) practically all available illumination comes from the "crater," a saucer shaped depression which forms on the upper (positive) carbon tip with D. C. and on both tips with A. C. (though with the latter the craters are usually flat, rather than depressed in the center, as with D. C.). The whole endeavor in setting the carbons should be to get the crater to form of good size and face the condensing lens as squarely as possible. Setting the carbons with D. C. is comparatively easy and simple. All projection lamps are so made that the top may be set further back than the bottom (angling the lamp, this is called) so as to aid in getting the crater square with the condenser. In all lamps but the Edison, I believe, this angle may be varied within certain limits. With D. C. the lamp should be angled back just as much as possible and not get the lower carbon tip, or any part of it, between the crater and condenser.

Whether or no the lower tip is interfering is somewhat difficult to tell unless one is able to closely examine the tips by aid of the glasses before mentioned. Draw a line with the eye, when the arc is burning normally, from the lower edge of the crater to the lower edge of the lens and if such a line strikes the lower tip there is interference and loss of illumination, though if slight it may not amount to much. The greater angle you can give the lamp without this interference the greater illumination you will get from a given arc, but the amount of angle will be checked by the lower carbon arm striking the front wall of the lamphouse when the lamp is wide open, or the lower carbon doing the same thing when a new one which projects below the arm is in. This must be taken into consideration since angling beyond the point where the carbon arm interferes involves burning a shorter lower carbon with consequent greater carbon waste. To old, competent operators I wish to say right here that these comparatively simple matters are not meant for you by any manner of means. Even you will, I trust and believe, find something of value in these articles, and you may also find things with which you will disagree. I may be wrong in some things, too. I don't know it all and never expect to. These articles are written for the fellow out in the small town, who has not the advantages of the city man for learning things, and who must blunder along as best he may, as well as for the better posted operator. I have, therefore, to be very explicit in some things which seem almost foolish to the competent operator. I wish to say, too, that I have been asked several times whether I mean to deal with the manager's end. I do and will later on.

I have already spoken, I believe, of the size of carbons best to use. With A. C. it matters not at all which wire is connected to upper or lower binding post of lamp, but with D. C. the negative must be connected to the lower and the positive to the upper. There are several methods of ascertaining which is the negative and which the positive wire, but the following is simplest: Connect one wire from one binding post of operating switch to upper binding post of lamp. Connect other wire through the rheostat to lower lamp binding post. Now, first being sure the resistance is in if using an adjustable rheostat, close the switch and light the lamp. Let it burn for five minutes and shut it off. Examine the carbon tips. If the lower is burned to a round point and the upper has a saucer-like depression you are all right, but if just the opposite condition exists change the wires at the lamp and cut the rheostat in on the other wire. The latter is not necessary but the writer prefers the rheostat on the negative wire, since he thus has a little less voltage on the lamp and this makes any shocks he may get somewhat lighter. Otherwise it makes no practical difference which wire it is on. Having ascertained that your carbons are in perfect line with each other sidewise (see "The Lamp") set your carbons in place as per Fig. 31. Some operators prefer setting the top carbon parallel with the lamp rack-bars and angling the lower one slightly ahead, but this is merely a matter of individual preference. We have now arrived at the one most important thing in securing good projection light, and that is to get the advancement of the lower carbon tip exactly right, since this is what will in great measure determine the position of your crater. If you set it too far back your crater will be too low down and the light will be thrown downward instead of straight ahead as it should be. If, on the other hand, you get it too far ahead a long "skirt" will form on the back edge of the upper carbon tip. This is not a good condition, since when it prevails the crater is not in the best position and moreover there is tendency of this "skirt" to break off, often fully half way up the crater. Fig 32A shows lower tip too far back. Fig. 32B. tip too far forward, Fig. 32C shows an ideal condition, and this latter condition may be at all times maintained, barring imperfections in carbons, by close attention. But let me impress upon you that it is more than anything else the exact amount of advancement of the lower carbon ahead of the upper which makes it. I am assuming, of course, that you have experimented and found what carbon, or combination of carbons, are best suited to your needs. There is little or no difference of opinion among operators as to the best set for D. C. carbons, but there is a vast difference in the matter of care to get the set exactly right so that the best possible results will be obtained. With A. C., however, it is quite another story. Fig. 31 shows one method of setting A. C. carbons and Fig. 33, A and B, two more, each of which have their advocates. It is, however, significant that whereas three years ago you could hardly find an operator setting his carbons as per Fig. 31 (the D. C. set) you will find at present that nearly all the high-class men set their carbons the same for either D. C. or A. C. They have discovered, as did the writer, that while freely granting a higher candle power for Fig. 33 sets, the crater cannot be controlled or maintained, hence steady light with these sets is an impossibility, especially with set B. (With set B, Fig. 32, the lamp itself should be set straight up and down.) I shall, therefore, confine my remarks largely to the set shown in Fig. 31, which I strongly advise all operators to use. It is precisely the same as the D. C. set, except that the top carbon should be set parallel with the lamp rackbars and the lower carbon angled forward a trifle. In using this set I cannot caution you too strongly to be exceedingly careful to get your carbons set exactly right. Pretty near enough won't do at all. They must be exactly right. Use the round points of the carbons as a guide in setting and find out just how far to set the lower tip ahead of the upper and then keep it that way. When you have it right the craters will be about as shown in Fig. 33C, which is ideal. With such a crater you will have white, steady, strong light at all times. If the upper crater burns too flat advance the lower tip just a very little. If the lower tip shows a tendency to form, as in Fig. 33D, move it back just a trifle, but remember that a little movement of the tips backward or forward may make a big difference in the form of the craters. The craters are small and 1-16-inch move of either tip makes a big change in their forms. With alternating the carbons must be fed little at a time and often and the arc must be comparatively short, but if too short a condition such as shown at Fig. 33E will arise. Such a condition means carbons kept too close together. The remedy is, if you get them in that shape, burn a long arc for a time. In fact whenever your crater is going wrong and you change your carbon tips, lengthen your arc for a couple of minutes until the crater form changes. With A. C. the colored glasses I have spoken of are almost an imperative necessity, since to get good results one simply must watch the arc itself. Operators may argue and tell what they can do until they are black in the face, but one thing they cannot do, no matter what they claim, and that is get a good, steady light with alternating without looking at the arc itself when anything is wrong with the light. With A. C. use 5/8 cored carbons above and below, also you should have not less than 45 amperes to get good results, 50 to 55 if you are using rheostat resistance. Right here let me offer a criticism which applies to nearly all lamps. I have shown the importance of backward and forward movement of the carbon tips, especially with alternating current. It is of prime importance that the operator be able to accomplish this movement at any time while running and frequently the necessary movement will be not to exceed 1-16 inch. Yet important as is the matter, most lamps have absolutely no provision for tilting the carbon arms except to pound them up or down or accomplish the desired result by tapping the carbon tip itself, which is unreliable and may result in breaking the carbon off entirely. The Motograph lamp has a screw by which the adjustment may be made, but it is not a practical arrangement, or rather it does not work well in practice—still it is much better than nothing at all. I am told there is one lamp with an excellent arrangement for this movement of the lamp arms, but I have not as yet seen it. It seems high time that lamp makers woke up to the necessity of this provision and gave us some practical method of tilting the lamp arms while running it. It is difficult to accomplish I know, but surely is not impossible. When you put in new carbons always burn a very long arc until the crater is formed.

AN ADDITION TO A FORMER SUBJECT.

A letter just received inquiring if there be any way of changing the focal length of a projection lens, reminds me that I did not set this matter forth when treating of the lens. Except for very slight corrections there is no satisfactory way of changing focal length of projection lenses. By cutting off the tube which holds the lenses, rethreading the end cut off, of course, the lenses are brought closer together and the focal length is shortened by the result is a matter of much doubt, unless the change be a slight one. If you wish to merely enlarge the picture by two or three inches, however, it is practical. You must remember that the lenses at each end of the tube are ground for a certain focal length and matched up carefully for that length and no other. Now if you shorten the length materially there will be wrong curvature of field and more or less spherical aberration, producing a blur on the curtain as though the picture were not in focus. An excellent rule for the ordinary man is not to meddle with the focal length of a projection lens. He may attain the desired result, but the chances are he will merely spoil a good lens. If you are determined to try it, however, take the lenses out of the tube (not out of their mounting, but out of the tube). Make two temporary tubes by rolling stiff writing paper, making one just so it will slip into the other snugly. Now mount the lenses in these tubes and by telescoping the two tubes you will be able to see just what the result will be when you get the focal length required to produce the size picture desired. If results are satisfactory you may measure the distance between the two lenses and cut the lens tube accordingly. There is also a cap made, having slight curvature, which slips over the end of the lens. This has the effect of increasing focal length, but the result usually is attained at expense of excellence. These caps may be had with heavy curvature to reduce focal length also. The advice of the writer is, however, to not attempt to make changes in the projection lenses. If the lens you have don't suit, get another. Usually your exchange will be willing to trade with you on a reasonable basis.

THE ADMISSION OF CHILDREN TO MOVING PICTURE SHOWS.

A measure is before the Scranton Councils, which if passed, will prevent children under 14 years of age attending moving picture shows or nickelettes without being accompanied by parents or guardian. The object in view is all right in parents knowing where the child may be, or in preventing the spending of money obtained unknown to parents, etc., but as far as whether the pictures are proper or not, it will not make any difference whether the parents accompany the child or not. The authorities should see that improper pictures are not permitted, and the repetition of an offense would mean a revoking of license.

Much has been written about the moral tone of moving picture shows. It has been shown time and time again that the pictures shown in these places of amusement are often not of the sort that should be provided for the entertainment of the young. Moving picture establishments have been referred to as the poor man's theater. They are entitled to this distinction. They place within the reach of everybody a means of entertainment in which language is not a consideration. For the price of one admission to the ordinary theater the head of a family can take his wife and all of his children to a moving picture performance and still have money left. And these shows appeal to the poor of the large cities, particularly because to understand them it is not necessary that one understand English. Pictures speak all languages. They tell their own story, without words. The manufacturers of films have been so successful in handling their subjects that they have found it possible to reproduce some of the finest and best of the works of the world's greatest playwrights, such, for instance, as Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet," and others equally well and favorably known.

From this standpoint, moving picture shows are an unquestioned blessing. But the trouble is that the proprietors of certain classes of these show places are not interested in anything quite so much as in box office receipts. To offset the morally clean picture shows, we have those that deal with murder and with crime in all of its worst phases.—Scranton (Pa.) Tribune.

[Is the moral effect less evil if the child is accompanied by a parent? Is the parent always the safest moral censor? We would rather abide by the judgment of the National Board of Censorship than that of many parents whom we know.—Ed. M. P. W.]

If you are not going to let people do anything on Sunday except go to church and walk around, there is soon going to be trouble. It is absurd to have people arrested for a thing like this.—Justice McInerny of Brooklyn Special Sessions, in commenting upon the arrest of an exhibitor.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

Rochester, the Flower City of New York State, which during last week witnessed a great photographic convention, has all things considered a large percentage of moving picture theaters to its population; in round numbers the latter is 200,000, and the past Winter saw seventeen moving picture houses in operation. I gathered by inquiry that they were very popular and successful. Just now of course the greater number of them are closed; but a month hence they will be reopening.

The streets of Rochester are irregularly drawn—the block system not having been adopted in laying them out. The center of things is Main street, a broad, handsome thoroughfare, and it is round about this street that "things" center. Here are the Bijou Dream, the Knickerbocker and other m. p. houses—the former externally a very large and handsome place. I went into the Knickerbocker one wet afternoon. It was crowded with people, who like myself paid 5 cents for admission.

Cleanliness, neatness and taste seem to characterize the Rochester m. p. houses. They are quite the equal in those respects of the best New York houses. The song slide does not appear to be prevalent. The singer of ballads does. One house I scrutinized relied upon an external pipe organ for the purpose of attracting the public. As this is the first provincial city in which I have studied moving picture matters I should like to say how pleased I was with the general appearance of the business. Although in the hot weather the Flower City has recently had I could not see much.

The Flower City, being in Lakeland, is well provided with waterside resorts. I went out to one of them. It is on the shores of Lake Ontario and is a miniature Coney. My visit was paid at night and I searched in vain for a moving picture theater. The authorities missed their opportunity for there were several thousands of photographers there that night. I hope the Rochester papers will see this paragraph and induce the management of Ontario Beach to mend the errors of their ways.

* * *

The charming hotel in which I recently stayed at the Flower City put on an orchestra through dinner. The soli (or solo pieces, if you don't like my Latin—or is it Italian?) were given off by an excellent phonograph. The selections were operatic. I threw out the suggestion that the conjunction of the moving pictures with the phonograph would be desirable and welcomed by the guests. My suggestion was approved of and no doubt you will see the idea carried out ere long.

Rochester people are very nice-mannered and as they treated your "Lux Graphicus" with great courtesy, he would like to say how delighted he was with his reception. It gratified me to hear The Moving Picture World so highly spoken of. No other paper seems to be known in connection with the business and I came into contact with people from all over the United States who are in touch with things that are happening.

I came in touch with folk at Rochester whom I have known for more years than I care to count. If you take photographs, or have taken them, it is extraordinary the bond of sympathy that arises amongst people and the interests thereby opened up. It is no exaggeration to say that the inner doings of the moving picture field were laid bare to me at Rochester last week. Some steps were taken there which are likely to lead to great developments. Very great developments indeed.

Our visit to Messrs. Donegan and Kraft, proprietors of the Open Air Theater on Willis avenue and 145th street, the other evening was very pleasant. Arriving at 8 P. M., we found that the theater was well filled, and it was with difficulty that we could find a vacant seat. The programme was very good. You are first given a concert by the orchestra of five pieces and a piano, after which the pictures are started. These pictures pleased the audience very much. The park is elaborately decorated with Chinese lanterns, flags of all nations, and miles of bunting. A young lady and two gentlemen sang illustrated songs to a very nicely colored set of slides by Scott & Van Altena.

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Philadelphia, August 2, 1909.

Fellow Exhibitors:

The circular letter printed in the Moving Picture World of July 24 is self-explanatory. The formation of an association of this kind, however, is an undertaking that requires deep thought and hard work on the part of its officers. We were unable to accomplish all the work we had laid out at the first meeting and take this measure of advising you that our next meeting will be held in the same room and building on Wednesday, August 11, at 2 o'clock p. m., when we expect to adopt by-laws and transact such other business as may be presented before the meeting. Do not fail to attend. Faithfully yours,

THE MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK

Held their regular bi-monthly meeting on Friday, July 30, at the Crown Theater, West 116th street. In spite of the unpropitious weather there was a fairly large audience. Mr. Robert Luce, 29 Liberty street, was elected as the lawyer to look after the interests of the association.

ITALIAN EXHIBITORS UNITE.

The Italian exhibitors of New York and vicinity are availing themselves of that first law of mankind—self-protection—and at a meeting held last week at the Florence Theater, 331 Bowery, discussed several suggestions for placing their business on a better paying basis. One of the complaints was the high prices that they have to pay for suitable vaudeville talent and it was suggested that they form a combine to run their houses on a circuit like the big theaters.

PHILADELPHIA EXHIBITORS TO MEET AUGUST 8.

A meeting of the Mutual Protective Association of Motion Picture Exhibitors of Philadelphia will be held at their headquarters, 2525 West Girard avenue, Sunday, August 8. It is expected that new energy will be displayed the coming season as a number of small places have gone out of business and the ones remaining will see that it is to their advantage to perfect their organization and strengthen their treasury.

Nevada City, Cal.—The Broadway Theater Company has purchased the business of the Nevada Refined Vaudeville and Picture Show Company. The picture show in the future in Nevada City will be conducted at the Broadway Theater, on Broad street, this being the only attraction of its kind in Nevada City. Gribbin & Williams, who have conducted the show at the Nevada Theater for several months, have retired from the local field. The former will go to Sacramento and will open a picture show theater at Oak Park, a suburb of that city. Mr. Williams will continue his lease of the Auditorium, at Grass Valley, giving the people there first-class shows.

The Cradle of the Moving Picture.

The Eastman Kodak Company's Plant at Rochester, Which Amazed the Delegates to the Photographer's Convention.

Last week there was a great gathering of persons interested in moving picture and stationary photography at Rochester, N. Y., the largest photographic manufacturing city in the world, and in the interests of The Moving Picture World we attended the meeting. Rochester is a beautiful city of over 200,000 inhabitants. The local welcome accorded the visitors was most cordial and the city was profusely beflagged. A most enjoyable week was spent and a record gathering was chronicled.

We have called Rochester the cradle of the moving picture for there most of the world's output of film for the negatives and positives is made by the Kodak Company.

In welcoming the visitors, Mr. Miner, the president of the Rochester Chamber of Commerce, said Rochester was the center of the photographic world, and those gathered there represent the highest type of that profession, to whose needs the factories minister. "It is true that much of the output of our establishments here is devoted to filling the wants of the amateur; but in pursuing the high calling of the art, the amateur and the professional march forward side by side, and to the amateur you owe a debt, for, by creating a large demand, he has helped the manufacturer to cater to the wants of the more skilled professional. It is the amateur whose demand has created the largest camera factories in the world (the smallest here is probably greater in size than the largest outside this city)—and it is he who has also created here the largest factories in the world for the manufacture of lenses, optical equipment and sensitized products. To supply your wants, this city does daily many wonderful things. In the Eastman factories is made more than 90 per cent. of all the moving picture films in the world—500 miles a day—a greater distance daily than the Empire State Express travels over the New York Central lines. Each week a ton of silver is used at Kodak park—the only other concern in the United States using as much as the United States Mint.

"The Kodak Works are also the largest consumers of aluminum in the United States, and in their paper storage warehouse you will find rolls enough, 41 inches wide, to reach from New York to San Francisco. For you, there is made annually thousands of miles of film, thousands of acres of paper, and trainloads of chemicals; and when the new plate building at Kodak park is finished, it will have a coating capacity of 1¼ acres of glass per day, and will be the largest single building in the world devoted to the manufacture of photographic goods. I have referred to these at some length, that you may see how much of the prosperity of one branch of our city's industries is dependent upon you, and why our commercial interests are glad to have you prosper. That is our response to your material side—but we still have much here to appeal to your sense of the beautiful—our parks, lake, river, falls, shady streets and drives, are things of which we are proud; and we ask you to consider them as yours, while you are within our gates."

In company with the other visitors we had the opportunity of going over Kodak park, where this great area of moving picture negative and positive film is made.

Only a few of the photographers who visited the park had any real appreciation of the magnitude of the great industrial enterprise that has made Rochester famous on five continents and in all the isles of the sea. Figures and statistics some of them had seen, but the actual sight of the park itself, the personal inspection of the miles of buildings, the gigantic scale on which the plant is operated were a revelation to the visitors.

Chartered cars ran to Kodak park and before 1 o'clock most of the photographers, their wives and friends were on the spacious grounds of the Eastman Company. Tents had been pitched on the lawn in front of the main entrance, and these served as dining rooms for the crowd. Another tent in the rear was for cooking and serving. In another extemporized pavilion a band of forty pieces discoursed music. A canvas wall higher than a man's head screened the entire front of the plant for several hundred feet, and a single entrance into the roadway, leading to the building, was through a canvas tunnel, similar to that erected in front of residences at a wedding or other social function.

George Eastman, president of the company, mingled with his guests. There was no formal reception, but everybody wanted to shake hands with Mr. Eastman, and he was the center of animated groups during the afternoon. Henry A. Strong, Albert O. Fenn, Alexander M. Lindsay and other prominent directors of the Eastman Company, were on the grounds, as were the managers of departments and chiefs of bureaus of the Eastman staff. Dozens of prominent business men, more or less closely affiliated with the Eastman enterprises, were guests of the company, as well as about 2,000 photographers, their wives and families.

A luncheon was served for an hour, until the multitude had been fed. The procession then started, marching in couples, and the inspection of the great plant began. Every detail had been arranged. The path led from one building to another, upstairs and downstairs, even through semi-darkened rooms—the line of march was said to have been two and one-quarter miles long—and thirty of the forty-six buildings at the park were visited. At each turn, arrows pointed the way, and at least a hundred employees of the factory stood along the lines at intervals of a few feet to keep watch of the crowds and see that everything ran smoothly and to explain the points of interest to each group as it wound slowly in and out of the buildings. It was like a labyrinth; after the journey was started, there seemed no way to turn back. The lines wound in and out of buildings, everyone eager to see things, and soon the astonishment at the magnitude of the plant was echoed on all sides.

The inspection plans were so carefully arranged that any intelligent man could not fail to gain more of an idea of the process of making photographic paper, cameras, moving picture films and the dozens of other products manufactured at the plant than he had ever before had in all his life. It was a liberal education for the photographic fraternity. Many of them said the visit to the Eastman factory was well worth coming to Rochester to see, even if there had been no convention here.

This extract from the souvenir book distributed to the visitors conveys some idea of the impression that was gained:

"We are accustomed in this country to stupendous figures, and when they are applied to the output of a steel mill or the tonnage of a railroad, we think not so much of it, because the products themselves are large. But a moving picture negative is such a tiny little thing, a post card is so small, an 8 x 10 plate is so insignificant as compared with a steel rail, and a camera is so unpretentious alongside of a locomotive or an automobile, that we do not look for mechanically big things in a photographic factory. In photography we think in grains and ounces and square inches—yet so great is the consumption of the various products that to contemplate the Eastman works we must think in acres and tons. In our Kodak park plant, 23 acres of floor space is given up to the manufacture of sensitized photographic goods; the new plate building now under construction will bring this total up to more than 28 acres, while our other Rochester factories, with combined floor space devoted exclusively to the photographic business, bring the total up to 37 acres in Rochester alone—and there is still more under construction.

Eastman Statistics.

"There are nearly 4,000 Rochester employees, and the capacity of our boilers is over 6,700 horse-power. The refrigerating machines at Kodak park have a cooling power equal to the melting of 1,920 tons of ice daily. The works are operated by 743 motors, varying in power from 1-12 to 75 horse-power, and these, with 7,000 incandescent lights, are furnished current by five engine-driven electric generators, with a capacity of 1,800 kilowatts, or 3,000 horse-power. In the Kodak park grounds, consisting of 43 acres, are two and a third miles of water mains, one and a third miles of brick pavement and three-quarters of a mile of railroad trackage."

The Boiler Room.

As the visitors walked along and saw the marvels of mechanical genius, the magnitude of the enterprise appeared almost to daze them. First was the boiler room, the seat of energy of the Eastman plant. Here were sixteen huge boilers, with a capacity of 6,000 horse-power. Above the boilers were located the coal bunkers, having a capacity of 3,200 tons, from which the coal drops through chutes to mechanical stokers. Eighty tons of coal is burned daily, the waste gases passing off through fuel economizers. There is no smoke nuisance at Kodak park; smoke means waste, and economy of product is too closely watched to permit waste on such a scale as would follow imperfect coal combustion.

Next came the refrigerating room, with its ten big machines, controlling the temperature of every building at the park, providing, as stated, the equivalent of 1,920 tons of melted ice daily.

A Comparison in Engines.

The dynamo room, which came next, looked like the biggest machine shop any of them had ever seen. There is practically no shafting at Kodak park. The machinery is driven by 743 motors, and the power is generated by five of the largest engine-driven dynamos that were ever made, lighting the entire plant and furnishing power to thousands of machines. By the side of the steam-driven electric giants which furnish light and power at the park, there was seen, as an interesting exhibit, the little 35 horse-power Buckeye engine, which twenty years ago furnished all the power needed for the entire Eastman plant of that day. It is enjoying a well earned rest after its years of service, and is kept in the model engine room as one of the exhibits, showing the increase of the plant in the past two decades.

Big and Little "Dope" Barrels.

The "dope" building was the center of interest to the expert photographers. Beneath the floor were the great barrels, holding 200,000 pounds of the syrup-like mixture from which the film base is made. Technically this is known as cellulose nitrate for the ordinary film and cellulose acetate for the new non-inflammable film now used for moving pictures. In the Eastman vernacular, the film base in this semi-liquid state is called "dope."

There is another interesting exhibit in this dope cellar. It is a small barrel which tells the story of the volume of the film business in 1891; it has a capacity of 500 pounds. The present barrels hold 4,000 pounds each and fifty of them are filled and refilled night and day. The managers are proud of these old-time exhibits, as they show more conclusively than any figures that could be given, the rapid growth of the volume of business of the plant.

A 20-Ton Lifting Crane.

One of the impressive sights at the park is the operation of the overhead traveling cranes. In the roll-coating building is one of these cranes with a 45-foot span and a capacity of 20 tons, three electric motors, all under the control of one operator, giving the different motions. In addition are two smaller cranes, each of 5 tons capacity. The cranes are used in moving the tanks of "dope" to and from the mixers.

The acid plant can hardly be called one of the show places at the park, but in its bearing on the quality of the products, it is immensely important, and the visitors who were professional scanned the section of the acid rooms with special interest. The sulphur burning furnaces mark the first step in the manufacture of sensitized silver products—the making of sulphuric acid, which, in combination with nitre, makes the nitric acid with which the silver bullion is nitrated for photographic purposes.

Silver Bullion in Piles.

A couple of employees stood guard over the piles of silver bricks. The Eastman Company is the largest consumer of silver bullion in the world, outside the United States Mint, the consumption of pure bullion amounting to about a ton a week. The visitors looked at the stack of silver bricks and some of them touched the piles as they walked by. Each brick is worth approximately $250.

As a sample of the thoroughness of the equipment and the care that is taken in manufacturing the film, the company, in order to obtain perfect salts and perfect chemicals, makes them. Nitric acid is used in connection with silver bullion to make silver nitrate. It makes its own sulphuric acid, from which, in combination with nitre, the nitric acid is made. This acid plant made necessary the enormous stock, 366 feet in height, the highest in America, in order to carry off the deadly poisonous gases. Nitric acid is not only used in nitrating the silver, but it is consumed in enormous quantities for cutting the raw cotton, which forms the base of transparent films.

In line with the manufacture of incidental products for use in the factory is the big department for the making of paper boxes. The box factory has a capacity of 25,000 paper boxes a day. In addition, there are made millions of envelopes for papers and millions of cartons for films. The box making, which is done mainly by girls, was one of the most interesting features of the inspection.

At one end of the park is a railroad warehouse on a spur of the New York Central that is large enough for a town of several thousand inhabitants. This is used mostly for incoming freight, the outgoing product being shipped from the State street building, with the exception of the glass plates in carload lots.

The Construction Department.

There is a construction department, with a large and fully equipped drafting room, where plans for special buildings and machinery are made by experts who know the peculiar requirements of the business. Much of the manufacturing is done in dark rooms, where ventilation becomes a matter of prime importance. In the roll coating building, for instance, are two ventilating fans, each 160 inches in diameter, giving a complete change of air every seven minutes. Heating, cooling and ventilation in a plant of this size and with such special requirements become so important a factor that the construction department experts spend much of the time in solving the various problems of this nature that are presented and designing the special equipment required.

The last building visited was the department where applications for work are received, where the time clocks are located, showing to the exact minute when each of the 2,000 park employees comes to work and leaves for the night. Here is the cashier's desk where 2,000 employees are paid off in ten minutes time each week.

At the northern end of the park the new plate building which is in process of construction was viewed with much interest. This building will be, when completed, the largest single building in the world devoted to the manufacture of photographic products. It is 357 x 338 feet and will add 229,000 square feet or 5¼ acres to the present floor space at the park. It will have a coating capacity of nearly an acre and a quarter of glass per day. It is reinforced concrete faced with brick and in size so far surpasses any of the other park buildings as to make them seem small in comparison.

ENCOURAGING ATTENDANCE AT THE SUMMER SHOWS.

These past weeks I have taken more than a passing notice of the open air theater and as the open air place is past the stage of an experiment, it has come to be a permanent feature, considering the weather. I believe the right place is out of doors and as it is my business to look up matters of this kind and as the public don't know me from the man in the moon, I have mingled quite freely with the patrons of the open air shows. And I want to say right here that the above places are doing good missionary work in elevating the industry of the moving picture business. There is a class visiting the open air places that has not had the good fortune of attending some of the 5 and 10-cent houses when indoor performance is more enjoyable under weather conditions. I always managed to occupy a seat in the surrounding company of the upper class and I have enjoyed some very good comments regarding the pictures shown as, for example: "Joe, isn't that just grand?" "Oh, how natural they are." "Mother, I never thought they was so good, we must have missed some very great pictures;" or, as one young lady remarked to her steady: "I wish they would show that picture called '——— ———;' I heard some time ago it was magnificently staged." So you can see the handwriting on the wall, the houses the coming season will see a class of high tone society among their many patrons. OLIVER, JR.

PAPAL ORDER FORBIDDING CLERGY TO ATTEND MOVING PICTURE SHOWS INJURING THE BUSINESS IN ITALY.

Rome, July 21.—Moving picture shows have been greatly damaged in this city and, indeed, throughout Italy by the action of the Pope in forbidding the clergy of Rome to attend them. This inhibition has extended to the laity not by Papal or clerical order, but by lay inference that anything displeasing to the head of the Church must be unfit for its followers.

Italy has been regarded as one of the best paying fields for such shows. The business has flourished in all the cities, the small cost of admission (from three to six cents, according to seats) enabling the showmen to fill their halls at intervals of twenty minutes from noon to midnight. When the fad began the subjects were harmless and often amusing. With its growth the character changed, until tragic love scenes and violent murder became leading subjects.

Police records of late have shown that much of the violence committed by criminals was to be traced to the influence of the realistic picture show horrors. This discovery prompted the Pope's order, which bids fair to drive the business out of Italy.—New York World.

The Tremont Open Air Theater, at 391 Boulevard, Rockaway Beach, is entertaining large crowds at every performance.

THE ELEMENTS OF ACCURACY IN MOVING PICTURE MANUFACTURE.

By Arthur S. Newman.

II.

Resuming the subject of perforation, celluloid is not altogether a nice substance in which to produce extreme accuracy. It expands with a rise in temperature, and the gelatine with which it is coated tends to expand and contract according to the amount of moisture contained in the atmosphere. So when a film is being perforated, a change in the temperature of the room or in the moisture in the atmosphere may cause one part of the film to be slightly different in gauge from another part. With the rotary perforator it might be difficult to prove this, because the quality of work turned out by such machines is not sufficiently accurate to prove anything. The more recently introduced machines—at least some of them—will easily show this variation. I said in my last article that it is advisable to keep the perforating room at an even temperature, as I believe in doing each process as accurately as possible. Should a film happen to vary somewhat in gauge from the above cause, the effect on the finished picture would not be of any great moment, as it would only appear on the screen as a slight gradual creep of the picture up or down as the case may be, and the amount of movement would probably be so small as not to require the mask of the projector to be altered in position. Nevertheless, every error should be eliminated if possible. Now, as to the kind of perforator from which the result nearest to perfection is to be expected. The old rotary form is out of count at once. It is a mechanical problem of extreme difficulty to place a series of punches accurately round a roller, to space them exactly, to make them point radially, all equally sharp, all the same length, and to all enter the holes in the opposing roller with the same amount of freedom or friction. To test the accuracy and evenness of a perforated film, a pin machine, as for instance, a Lumiere or Vitagraph, should have the gate altered so that three or four perforations each side of the picture can be thrown on the screen. I am of opinion that this experiment tried on film from many of the machines now in use would open the eyes of some of our manufacturers to the cause of some of the unsteadiness of their productions. Uneven perforation acts and re-acts to cause errors, as a little consideration will soon show. Suppose a perforator is producing work which varies slightly from foot to foot, and suppose, for the sake of argument, that the error amounts to 1-200th of an inch in 4 inches, sometimes long, sometimes short of the average. When such a film is used in the taker, the driving mechanism of which, we will suppose, is 4 inches below the mask, the resulting pictures in the negative will be misplaced on the film to the extent of 1-200th of an inch, sometimes up and sometimes down. This, of course, supposes the taker mechanism to be perfect in action. The variation among the pictures will amount to 1-100th of an inch.

From the developed negative we take a print, using a machine having its driving part, i. e., where it engages with the perforations, similarly placed to that of the taker, 4 inches away from the printing-mask, and we use a positive film perforated in the same way and with the same amount of inaccuracy as was present in the negative film. When a short gauge piece of the film happens to come in contact with a long gauge piece, we shall have our printed pictures misplaced by 1-100th of an inch, sometimes up, sometimes down —a total variation from top to bottom of 1-50th of an inch. This calculation does not allow for any inaccuracy in the camera, the printer, or the projector, but is put before you only to drive home the fact that to have steady pictures the perforation must be faultless. Unfortunately, the camera, printer, and projector all possess faults of their own, but their faults are not so ready to react as are those of perforation.

Perforators are of two kinds, those which measure from hole to hole, and punch a pair of holes at a time; and those which punch four or more holes each time the die comes down.

The rotary perforator belongs to the first class, and depends for its approach to accuracy on the placing of the punches on the roller. This machine is so simple and so well known that I shall not describe it, and shall close this week's section by advising all who wish to produce good work to discard the "Rotary," in spite of its acknowledged simplicity and rapidity in action. Its two small virtues have been the cause of a large amount of poor work.

Continuing the subject of perforators, we now come to the machines having definite mechanism for the purpose of measuring out the spaces between the succeeding pairs of holes. In the original machines a sprocket wheel was arranged over which the perforated part of the film passed, the sprocket being moved intermittently, and remaining at rest just while the pair of holes was punched. The gauge in these machines depended wholly upon the accuracy—or otherwise—of the sprocket wheel. It is a difficult matter to cut and mount a sprocket wheel so true that errors cannot be detected, and owing to this difficulty, many of the machines were provided with imperfect, or untruly mounted sprockets, and consequently produced imperfect work. In the case of badly spaced sprocket teeth the variations in the perforations would be similar to the variations in the teeth; while in the case of an untruly mounted sprocket, the variations would be increased by double the amount of the misplacing of the wheel, and would appear on the film in the form of a gradual increase of gauge for one-half revolution of the sprocket, followed by a corresponding decrease during the second half of the revolution. Machines dependent for their gauge on the measuring sprocket system cannot be classed among the accurate perforators; although one here and there may produce good results.

In another much used system of measuring, a clamp or grip was arranged in such a manner that, having clamped the film tightly, while the punches entered the holes, the clamp was moved to a new position on the film during the time the punches were through the film. Directly the punches were lifted clear of the film, the clamp was moved to its previous position, carrying the film with it, and the same operations repeated. The spacing effected by this method is generally reasonably accurate. Inaccuracies, however, still exist, and are due to the fact that film varies in thickness, and a thick film will be held sooner, let go quicker, and moved farther than will a thin film; also the amount of travel given to the clamp can vary in many ways.

If moved by a crank, or eccentric, the viscosity of the oil in the joints can vary sufficiently to cause easily detected errors in the work done, and in the case where the spacing grip is cam-driven and governed in travel by a spring and stop-piece, the smallest particle of dirt on the cam or between the butting surfaces of the stop-piece will throw the gauge quite away from the normal.

Sixty-four operations of the machine are required to punch a foot of film, and should the movement of the clamp be only 1-600th of an inch short of normal, due to dirt between the butting surfaces of the stop-piece, the perforated film will be inaccurate by an amount greater than 1-10th of an inch to the foot. With even temperature, good oil, scrupulous cleanliness, and a constant speed, very good work can be turned out with the clamp spacing perforator, provided the film be of even thickness, and also free from those small excrescences which are often met with; but it is rather an unreliable style of machine at the best. Anything foreign, such as a stray piece of celluloid, getting into any part of the measuring system, may cause havoc with the gauge, and may easily escape notice until a considerable quantity of stock has been wrongly perforated.

The next system I shall describe is characterized by having a "guide" or measuring pin, or pins, placed at an exact distance from the punches, the pins being similar in action to that of the punches, and tapered to a blunt point. Mechanism is provided for moving the film along, approximately to the distance required, but in this class of machine accuracy is not trusted to the system of levers, or the sprocket, or other method by which the film is advanced. The accuracy is insured by the "guide" pin, and if properly made and fitted, the result is highly satisfactory, variation being easily kept within the latitude of 1-100th of an inch to the foot, and with steady running and proper treatment often reduced to 1-400th of an inch in the same space. The operation of the guide pin is as follows: A hole having been punched, the feed mechanism advances the film approximately ready for the punching of the next hole. Before the punch comes down, the pointed end of the guide pin enters the hole already punched, and as it comes down and fits the hole, moves the film forwards or backwards as may be required, correcting the amount of space through which the feed mechanism has advanced the film; the punch then pierces the film while it is still held in position by the guide pin. Variation in thickness of film does not affect the gauge of this machine, nor do small pieces of foreign matter have power to upset its accuracy. It must, however, be well made, and if properly fitted and reasonably looked after will produce remarkably accurate work.

Some machines are made to punch more than one pair of holes in one operation—generally four pairs. To do this the film requires to be advanced four times the distance, and care must be taken not to run these machines too fast. It might be supposed that as the machine will punch four times as many holes in one operation as the previously described form, four times as much film could be perforated in a given time. Not so, and for the following reasons: The moving parts of the machine will of necessity be more heavily constructed, because they have increased work to do, and if these heavier weights are moved at a great speed, vibration will result and accuracy be sacrificed to speed of production. Nevertheless, a machine to punch four holes at an operation will doubtless do safely nearly three times the amount of work to be got from a one-hole machine.

Four-hole machines have been made with the same variety of measuring and feeding mechanisms as have the one-hole machines, and practically with the same effect on the accuracy—or otherwise—of the perforations.

The best system, again, is that with the independent approximate feed mechanism, and with the guide pin principle to correct the position of the film, while the punching is taking place. Four-hole machines do a great deal of work in a short time, but are less liable to be accurate than those which measure off each pair of holes. It is not impossible to get eight punches so placed in a die that inaccuracies cannot be detected, but it is very difficult indeed, and decidedly costly in any case. A four-hole machine properly made can give as accurate results as a one-hole machine; generally a slight variation can be detected every fourth hole. This is not of much moment, provided it is regular throughout the film, as it carries its own compensating quality with it. This I shall endeavor to explain next week.

PENNSYLVANIA EXHIBITORS AND RENTERS.

Do not miss the meeting of The Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Pennsylvania" to be held on August 11, Room C, Odd Fellows Temple, Broad and Cherry streets, Philadelphia, Pa.

As we believe in such an organization, and as our best wishes are to see all the moving picture interests strongly united together for mutual protection, we gave a rather encouraging and favorable report of the first meeting, to not discourage the lukewarm fellows.

After a stay of a few days in Philadelphia, we have found, with much satisfaction, that the two opposed factions have reconsidered the matter and are willing to make concessions on both sides, with the same object in view, viz: The chartering of a strong and harmonious organization to protect the industry against the numerous and always increasing enemies of moving pictures.

As certain disagreeable rumors have been circulated and are still circulated by persons not familiar with the facts, but who like to gossip for the mere satisfaction of hearing themselves talk, we deem it our duty to re-establish the true facts, to avoid a recurrence of bad feelings at the next meeting of August 11. The peace is made and we ask you, one and all, to come to the next meeting, with a broad smile and open arms, to cement this peace with a pleasant and harmonious meeting.

We believe in telling the plain truth, as we edit this paper for the benefit of all concerned. In certain questions, as the one now facing the Pennsylvania exhibitors, it is paramount for everyone to abandon all personal difficulties, to join in a common movement to fight the evils. When the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed an unjust law, no one said a word. The laws are the most unjust ones ever recorded on books. The laws are for the supposed safety of the audiences of moving picture shows. The laws are unjust because said laws impose the most ridiculous restrictions on the small towns, while the exhibitors of larger cities are not molested. Such arbitrary laws are to be found in the State claiming to be the cradle of liberty, the State boasting all over the world that the great Declaration of Independence, proclaiming liberty, freedom and equality of man, was framed and signed by their ancestors in the city of Philadelphia.

Chester, Norristown, Reading, etc., are ordered to have special aisles, special booths, etc., while Philadelphia, Pittsburg and Scranton can have anything they want. The passage of such unjust laws shows conclusively that said laws were urged by some enemies of the moving picture interests as the theatrical managers, to punish those exhibitors who had adopted vaudeville. When the enemies of cinematography framed the laws, they knew well that the cities of Philadelphia and of Pittsburg, with their rotten politics, would kill the bill before the measure could pass a second reading, and for this reason made the laws against the exhibitors of the small towns that had no one to protect or to defend them.

For the success of the new movement, we deem it advisable to give the plain facts, and if, by so doing, we should hurt some feelings, we ask your indulgence, as our object is to benefit all the exhibitors and not only a few selected ones.

There is in Philadelphia an organization called The Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Philadelphia. It is a city organization. Because said association did not boast of all the good work they were trying to do, some members got dissatisfied and blamed the association for not going to Harrisburg to fight the new laws. Now we know, and the minutes of said association will show, that some inquiries were made at Harrisburg and when it was announced that the laws were not to touch Philadelphia, the city organization had no more say in the matter. In fact, when we study the question, the city organization would have acted against the interests of their members by going to Harrisburg, as said laws would have been a boom for the city of Philadelphia. Yes, if the laws had closed all the shows in Chester, Norristown, Media, etc., the inhabitants of the suburban towns, deprived of moving picture shows, would have flocked to Philadelphia for their amusement. If the Exhibitors' Association of Philadelphia had made too much of a kick at the Capitol of Harrisburg, the Legislators could have reconsidered the laws and made them against the large cities as well as against the small towns.

The State exhibitors had then no reason to place the blame on the shoulders of The Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of Philadelphia, as said association is a pure city organization and had no reason to go to Harrisburg.

The dissatisfied exhibitors, mostly State exhibitors, decided to punish The Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of Philadelphia, and for this reason they circulated ugly rumors that the city organization was doing nothing, was in debt, was holding social meetings instead of business meetings, etc. These dissatisfied exhibitors decided to start a new organization and committed a grave blunder in adopting a very similar name, calling themselves The Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Pennsylvania. The members of the city organization resented such a move. They took it for granted that the new association wanted to give the impression that it was the successor of the old association; a hostile move to put them out of existence.

With all these bad feelings, both camps were worked to a high pitch for the meeting of July 28, last. Some came with the will and energy and also loaded with ready solid cash, to launch their pet association, while others came fully determined to pull down everything, to save the honor of the old organization.

This was very regrettable, as the meeting of July 28 turned out to be a farce, a meeting of discord. The proceedings were so arbitrary that several renters and exhibitors were refused admission, with no plausible reason, except floating rumors.

The meeting was not only a farce, but an usurpation of power, as the promoters, with no minutes of their previous meetings, no by-laws, nothing to show a regularly and legally chartered organization, assumed the power to elect officers, vote on the initiation fee and dues, etc.

We excuse the officers of said State organization for having used such arbitrary measures, as it was a question for them to either sink the new movement or make it a success by putting down the hostile disposition from the other side. We do not blame them for having usurped the power as such an organization is badly needed, and we felt that all things would come for the best of everyone.

There is no reason why both associations should not be prosperous and work together. The city of Philadelphia needs an organization to look after all the violations of police and of fire departments, and the city of Philadelphia, as well as the State of Pennsylvania, needs a strong State organization.

As the city organization is chartered under the name of The Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Philadelphia, we suggest for the new State organization a new name, as: The Moving Picture Interests of Pennsylvania, or The Pennsylvania Motion Pictures Association, as the manufacturers, exchanges, renters, exhibitors, supply dealers, etc., are as much interested in the State laws as the exhibitors are.

Some unscrupulous exhibitors have adopted the vaudeville acts to such an extent that the theatrical men went to Harrisburg to kill the moving pictures. Some other exhibitors show the worst junk they can get as long as they can get it cheap, and show five to six reels to ruin their competitors; they are too blind to see that they are killing themselves. We have many such hard questions to tackle; we have enough work ahead for two good organizations (one State, one city) without wasting our time, energy and money in petty fights, which fights will mean ruin to all interested.

We give much space to this question, not only for the success of the Pennsylvania exhibitors, but because we believe it is time that each State of the Union should have a State organization to protect the interests of the industry against the enemies of moving pictures. We want to see a strong and powerful organization in Pennsylvania, and you can depend on us. If you do what is just and fair we will fight by your side.

Unite the two organizations and for the sake of all concerned drop all petty jealousy. Let us see a free, easy and cordial meeting on August 11. Let this date of August 11 be a new era in the field of moving pictures. Let August 11 be the day of independence of the motion pictures and let Philadelphia, the cradle of liberty, ring another Independence bell, which will bring joy to thousands of exhibitors and millions of spectators.

Let us hope that Room C on the seventh floor of the Odd Fellows Temple will be entirely too small to accommodate the numerous exhibitors anxious to shake hands and join in the best movement ever proposed to save the industry from the enemy. Let us hope that all the exhibitors will leave in the ante-room, petty jealousy, grudges, difficulties, hard feelings, etc., and enter the meeting room with a broad smile and open arms.

There has been a misunderstanding and there have been, as is generally the case of meetings called at a short notice, a few excited persons who see danger looming up from every corner, but now peace is made, the promoters of the movement are no more arbitrary, but they offer you the olive branch. This olive branch is the invitatiion published on another page. They put no more restriction, the door is not to be closed on you, you are invited to fill the application blank, to send money, and if you are an exhibitor in good standing, you will be admitted. You do not want a better proof of their sincerity, when they do not invite you to come to the meeting to submit to their rules and regulations, but invite you to form these very rules and regulations, in asking you to come to vote on the by-laws. This means a good deal on the part of the promoters. It means that they surrender the power they had been compelled to assume at the first meeting to stop the ringleaders of the opposition. This is a very strong mark of sincerity on the part of the promoters, for the welfare of a new organization badly needed for the protection of the moving picture interests. As long as the promoters make all these concessions, why should you remain on your hostile disposition? By inviting you to come to discuss and adopt the by-laws, they give you a chance to ratify the elections of officers, they give you a chance to add more officers, to decide if they are to be paid and what are to be the salaries, give you a chanc to vote on the initiation fee, if same is to remain $10, or be increased. As no by-laws have been adopted, the promoters, in inviting you to pass on said by-laws, certainly offer you the olive branch by telling you that all that has been done has been only preliminary work. Now it is up to you as a mass meeting of the exhibitors of Pennsylvania, to ratify or modify what has been done for the best interests of all concerned. We have no voice in this matter, but we would urge all the exhibitors to reward the gentlemen who, by hard work and personal expenses, have made the organization possible, by ratifying all that has been done thus far.

Because we deeply deplore that the good intentions of the promoters have been misrepresented by petty jealousy, we deem it our duty to notify all the exhibitors to pay no attention to certain rumors, but to come in mass at the next meeting, to see for themselves that everything will be harmony, with only one object in view—the protection of the industry against arbitrary laws or enemies of moving pictures.

We need not tell you in closing these lines that this organization is absolutely necessary.

Comments on the Week's Films.

"The Tramp's Story."—An Essanay picture which tells a sad story—a story which is too often true and too often repented. It tells very forcibly of the infatuation of a country girl for a young man from the city, an elopement, betrayal, abandonment, grief and death, and it tells all this forcibly, too forcibly for one's peace of mind. There are several dramatic scenes which will linger long in one's memory, but perhaps the one where the girl drops dead at her father's feet is most moving of all. The death of the mother is not so dramatic, but is very moving. When the father, now turned tramp, finds his daughter's betrayer and administers to the scoundrel his just deserts everyone's heart warms to him and all feel that it is but a reasonable retribution for his perfidy. This story is told with the usual ability which characterizes the work of the Essanay Company. And while the picture is more or less shrouded in gloom one forgets some of it in admiring the excellence of the acting. Photographically improvement is possible, but the staging is perhaps as satisfactory as would be possible under most circumstances. While there is improvement in the photographic quality of the Essanay films, room for still further improvement exists.

"A Case of Seltzer."—A lively comedy from the Essanay studio in which a masher is soundly thrashed and his dandified appearance seriously damaged by a vigorous application of the contents of a number of seltzer bottles. One might wish that other cases of this kind might be as summarily dealt with. Such a film affords little chance for dramatic action. The interest is centered in the rough house which constitutes the bulk of the action.

"The Barber's Revenge."—A Pathe picture in which a flirtation with a barber's wife gets a musician into difficulty, and finally results in the loss of his beautiful long hair. Then he finds his own wife in the arms of a stranger, but his appearance is so changed he isn't recognized and is thrown out. But after a time all is adjusted and he is accepted as the right one. This is classed as a comedy, but aside from the musician's curious appearance after his hair is shaved off, there is little fun in it. Such questionable flirtations are not classed as funny in America. There are plenty of funny incidents to make films without making sport of the marital relation.

"The Slave."—Another drama which will add materially to the reputation of the Biograph Company for conceiving and producing as good dramas as any in the motion picture field. Devotion, no matter in what way it is developed, is always an attractive subject and the devotion of a wife in this drama, who offers herself as a slave for the purpose of procuring money to help her needy husband, is a conception which will linger long in the memory, and though the idea itself may be abhorrent, the devotion which accompanies and justifies the act removes the objectionable influence and one can but admire the young woman who allows herself to be sold to the highest bidder in the slave market. Slavery, and particularly the kind of slavery here suggested, is so much at variance with the modern world that one almost feels sick with the emotions which are aroused, and yet there is a wonderful fascination about this piece which makes it impossible to allow even a little of it to escape and one follows irresistibly the scenes as they change, bringing other developments in the story. Then when the woman is finally purchased and discovers that she is the property of the man who formerly declared his love for her the audience is almost breathless to learn what he will do now that he has the coveted prize in his possession. And here lies the dramatic climax. He, instead of doing as most men would have done under similar circumstances, when he has learned of the sacrifice, sends her back to her husband with sufficient to enable them to live comfortably. The dramatic strength and attractiveness of this picture are unusually well developed and in the hands of the Biograph's capable actors the picture becomes more than good. It ranks with the best dramatic films yet produced. Careful attention to detail, good photographic quality and the numerous attractive features which go to make up a dramatic film are all present here and the manager who adds this to his program is certain to please his audience.

"Sporting Blood."—A Lubin comedy in which there is a misunderstanding of a telegram which gets a young husband into trouble by sending his wife careering after him, followed by all her neighbors. In the meantime the husband has heard that his wife has suddenly gone insane and sends the police after her. Eventually they all meet and the telegram is explained to the satisfaction of everybody, more especially as it is found that it alluded to a horse upon which the husband won a goodly sum which he dutifully turns over to his wife. The amusing complications are lively and keep everybody interested. Like all the Lubin comedies it makes people laugh.

"Mr. Buttinsky."—A Lubin comedy which illustrates the usual fate of the man who butts in. Always getting into trouble by seeking to mend the troubles of others he at last lands in the water where he finds nothing else to butt into. Consequently he is left wondering why. This might be shown with good effect to the Buttinskys who throng practically all neighborhoods.

"The Heart of a Race Tout."—A Selig which has the dash and movement of the Selig dramas, and brings out in strong relief the oft repeated assertion that among sporting men, even among race touts, there may be good hearts. Anyhow, the numerous interesting developments in this picture which go to prove that there is good in all men, are emphasized by the good acting and the excellent photographic quality of the film. The picture is rather long, but there is so much interest in it that no one tires. The picture with a heart interest, no matter how it may be developed, wins approval from any audience. And in this there is illness, but no death and some interesting, because novel, situations are developed. and so interesting, because novel, situations are developed. It is certain to be well received everywhere and should make a welcome addition to any programme.

"Admirer of the Mustaches."—A foreign film which was seen in an independent theater and has little to commend it. Presumably meant for a comedy it is really only silly. That a husband and wife should quarrel because the wife admired the mustaches of a music teacher may seem amusing to French audiences, but only when the husband produces a revolver and a huge razor and forces the music master to amputate the offending mustaches does the audience show much interest. And then it is the burlesque represented in the huge razor rather than for any other reason.

"Professor of Dancing."—An Eclair which represents some cheap sport dressing as a dancing master and assuming to instruct a family which had been invited to an entertainment. Of course he instructs them to do absurd things which are rough and coarse, rather than funny, and in the end they are all run out of the place. The only amusing thing is when the dancing master appears to complete his lessons. What he gets is funny. The rest of it is inane rather than amusing. The photographic quality is fair in some parts, but in others it is weak. The operator spoiled it by running his machine too fast.

"The Missionary."—A picture without a manufacturer's mark. It may be well to represent the practices of the church under certain occasions, including the attitude of prayer, but probably most of those who are interested in the church will agree that this had better be left off the screens. There is a death bed scene in this film which is fairly good, but is rather too stilted. Nevertheless it is less objectionable than calling the church into the picture. When the new missionary starts for Africa there is no sub-title and the film changes immediately from the interior of the monastery to the African village where the convert acts as a missionary until he is killed in a battle between natives who sought his life and the soldiers. The motion picture world would have been quite as attractive if this film had never been made.

"A Game of Ninepins."—A Le Lion which develops the chase idea in a new way, by allowing a gentleman who is playing ninepins out of doors to throw the balls too far. As a consequence they start rolling and perform the usual damage before they are finally captured. The ending is very age before the yare finally captured. The ending is very abrupt and seems to have no particular relation to the rest. The balls disappear after they are captured and the crowd starts after them again and there the film ends. The photographic quality is good and some laughs are raised by the difficulties created by the balls in their mad rush.

"The Curate at the Races."—A Hepwix which takes for a subject the experiences of a curate who was sent to the races to distribute tracts and falls into the hands of the race hangers on, who do all sorts of things to him, finally ending up with changing clothes with him so he is taken for a bookmaker who can't pay the winnings. He barely escapes a ducking, being saved by the timely arrival of the bishop in a carriage, who forthwith pitches all who were following the curate into the water. The photographic quality is good, and the pictures of a race are excellent, with a single exception, where the camera was too near. There the moving horses are blurred.

"The Gypsy Artist."—This drama from the New York Motion Picture Company is certain to prove very attractive wherever it is shown. There is plenty of life and animation, and as one situation after another develops the interest increases. There is no death, but a child is kidnapped, there are several fights, and one or two abductions, together with plenty of other melodramatic material, all of which ends happily with the villain being led away by two burly policemen and the young artist in the arms of his sweetheart or wife and his mother, whom he had not seen since he was a youngster. If one can desire more than this in a film he is indeed hard to please. Most of the characters are well adapted to the parts they play, which makes the drama run smoothly and brings about the denoucments in a perfectly natural way.

"Territorial on the Brain."—A foreign picture without the manufacturer's imprint, which is lively, though the operator injured it by running his machine too fast, imparting to the characters a jerky movement which was difficult to follow. Just what the story may mean will not be clear to many who see it. That a man should see a drama and then begin to drill everyone he meets would be amusing, but "territorial" used in the sense that is here presented will not be clear to Americans. It means nothing to them and more than one within the hearing of the writer called the film silly, largely, probably, because its meaning was not plain. The photographic quality was not satisfactory. While the exteriors were clear black and white, there was some disposition to blur and the interiors were far from clear and plain.

"Love's Sacrifice."—A drama from the Edison studios which tells a tender love story in an adequate manner. It is a story of a love so great that it renounces itself for the sake of the happiness of one who is loved, and such lessons are far too few in this age of the world. The Edison Company has worked out the story with careful attention to details and the dramatic possibilities have been developed to the full. From the opening scene, until the climax is reached, where the wandering lover returns just in time to take another's place at the wedding, the picture has a deep heart interest and the hearts of those who see it respond to the suggestions which are offered by every scene. The Edison Company has achieved another dramatic success in this picture, adding to their already high reputation for presenting its excellent dramas in an excellent manner. The technical qualities of the film assist in maintaining the high standard of the dramatic qualities. The story is simple, easily understood and carefully worked out. Great success is predicted for this picture.

"Mulligan's Waterloo."—An Edison comedy in which a brawny fighting man is shown using his fists so effectively that whole platoons of fierce men fall before him. All day it is the same, easily defeating any combination that could be formed against him. He arrives at home and disposes of a few men who trouble him about various little matters. But when he finds fault with the dinner Mrs. Mulligan has prepared for him his troubles begin. A combination cyclone and pile driver begins operations instantly and when Mrs. Mulligan has ceased her peculiar style of massage he is glad to beg forgiveness and eat whatever is set before him without a murmur. Numerous comic situations are developed in this picture and it is a good comedy in every sense. Technically it is satisfactory, even though the action in some instances is liveely enough to disconcert the photographer. There is no question about the satisfaction with which the audience sees Mulligan get his.

"In Hot Water."—A comedy from the Gaumont studio which is a repetition of many others, where the kitchen maid receives her gentleman friend, only to be frightened by the unexpected return of the mistress. In this instance they vary the flight of the caller by hiding him in a boiler, into which hot water is poured and he is liquefied. Of course, he is restored later by some process of manipulation in which the maid indulges.

"An Easy Job."—Whoever supplied this scenario to the Gaumont studio did something original, at least as far as motion pictures are concerned. To have a lady catch her foot in the rails is original in this direction, at least. And to have the track torn up for her benefit is, perhaps, original, too, when it would seem as though almost any fool could have thought of taking off the shoe. The stunt of the shoe salesman who suggested this solution of the problem in selling her a new pair of shoes, is quite realistic. One feels like commending this beyond its deserts because it is out of the ordinary and required some thinking to devise the scenes. Technically it is quite up to the average of the Gaumont films.

"Wonderful Rose Designs."—A film from the Pathes which requires no criticism. It is one of those dissolving pictures which is well worth seeing and which adds materially to any program. No firm but the Pathes has succeeded so well in producing pictures of this sort, and their efforts are entitled to the strongest praise. These pictures always add to the interest of a program.

"The Gamekeeper's Son."—A Pathe which tells a story of love betweeen a gamekeeper's son and the daughter of the earl upon whose estate the keeper is employed. There is a clandestine meeting of the lovers, a shot at the young man as he leaves the girl's room, and the confession of a younger brother which saves him from discovery. It is somewhat involved and has an ending which does not seem quite satisfactory. In other words, to leave the couple there, just as the young man has returned, seems wrong. It should have been worked out to some conclusion, either to a wedding, or to the young man being sent away for good. The photographic quality of the film is exceptionally good, but the story is not told with the accustomed clearness of the Pathes. To the close observer, however, it appeals and is perhaps the strongest film of the week.

"A Georgia Wedding."—A Vitagraph picture of a colored wedding which has many funny incidents connected with it and does not fail to entertain. The disparity between the shapes and sizes of the bride and groom is quite enough to excite the risibilities at the start. When they attempt to enter his cabin and she cannot because she is so tall, a curious situation is presented, but it is settled by having the wedding outdoors. All through the picture runs a vein of colored humor which is mirth-provoking and reasonably true to what might actually occur under similar circumstances. It is a good bit of comedy and the technical qualities assist materially in making it attractive.

"The Artist's Revenge."—A picture from the Vitagraph studio which may have the element of vigorous action, but doesn't seem worthy of the company that produced it or the actors that played it. The petty revenge to which the artist descends in this instance is neither comedy nor tragedy, though it comes dangerously near to being tragedy for one. Humor should be always wholesome, but it is sometimes prostituted, and this picture is offensively near the border line. The provocation may have been great, but it does not increase one's reverence for art, or those who practice it, to see such petty meanness ascribed to one who acts the role of an artist on a motion picture film.

"When the Flag Drops."—A stirring Revolutionary picture from Lubin which fairly makes the blood tingle, in places, though it seems as though some scenes might be improved. Here is a spy captured by the British, and a message is found on him which is a counterfeit, but, nevertheless, it causes him to be sentenced to be executed. This portion is probably as good as it could be made. The drawing of the bullets from the guns seems a bit far-fetched, without the connivance of the officers, but even that might go without adverse comment, in view of the necessity. The execution may be true to life, but it looks coarse and unfeeling to see the supposed dead body piled unceremoniously upon the rear end of an old-fashioned buckboard and carted away like a log. One cannot conceive that the man's lover would do that, even though she was perfectly sure he was alive. It doesn't look natural. The capture of the spy is involved. In fact, the audience does not see when it is done. They see the spy, then two bodies of horsemen riding toward each other, and the next scene shows the spy being tried. It is a bit uncertain, but perhaps the strength of the rest of the story compensates for this seeming uncertainty. The last scene, where the real dispatch is delivered and the general pins a medal on the girl's breast, is very pleasing. A touch of grotesque humor is given to early scenes by the sewing of the real dispatch into the seat of the young man's trousers. Photographically the film is good and clear, with the exception of the scene where the flag is held ready to drop. That is clouded, and while it does not prevent seeing what the picture is, it is not up to the standard of the rest of the film. It is a good subject to which the producer has not done full justice.

"Fantastic Heads."—A magic film from the Pathe studio which develops a good form of trick photography. It is clearly photographed and beautifully colored, with attractive ballets and other diversions to add interest. The exchanging of heads, their enlargement and reduction, without the body moving nearer to the cameera, is well managed and attractive.

"The Butler's Trick."—A Pathe which illustrates the cupidity of a butler, who, when his employers quarrel and go out different ways, leases their apartment to a newly-married couple. There are a number of complications when the real occupants return, which are not especially funny, but there is, at least, nothing gloomy about them, and then follow the usual explanations and the unceremonious kicking out of the butler, who returns, somewhat intoxicated, during the most heated part of the argument.

Moving Picture World,

NEW YORK.

Gentlemen:

We wired you yesterday as follows: "Repeat Silverine Curtain Coating ad this week's issue. Give us boost regular columns," all of which we now beg to confirm. We received your reply that we would be reported next week, as it was too late for this week's issue.

For your information we wish to say that our first advertisement brought us such surprising results that we decided to repeat it. We received replies from nearly every corner of the United States, and they, without exception, brought orders. Almost every mail since your last issue has been off the press has brought us answers.

Relative to our new preparation, Silverine Curtain Coating, which we are advertising, will say that this is without doubt one of the greatest helps towards the improvement of the moving picture on the screen that has ever been produced. We have experimented for something like six months with different kinds of curtain paint, have tried everything that has ever been put on the market, and as a result of our efforts we now offer to the public Silverine Curtain Coating. It does us good to see the way it has taken with the better class of theaters, as anyone who has eyes and can see knows that there is a wonderful difference between the pictures before and after using.

We do not claim that this preparation will make it possible to show pictures in daylight, as some may be led to believe, but we do claim that it will allow a much greater percentage of daylight, or artificial light, in the moving picture theater, without having the slightest effect on the quality of the picture. This fact alone has been fully demonstrated in half a dozen cases, and is the very thing which is making it so popular with the exhibitors in all parts of the United States.

Yours truly,

C. D. STRUBLE,

Secretary and Manager.

It is now perhaps the most up-to-date in that part of the country and under the efficient management of B. H. Powell, is making money for the stockholders. The operating booth is roomy, 10 x 10 feet, and equipped with two latest model Edison machines, mercury arc rectifier and double dissolving lantern. A continuous performance is given at 5 cents admission, pictures and songs only, licensed films, including seven first run reels per week.

SLIDE NOTES.

Mr. Henry B. Ingram, of the Henry B. Ingram Company, 42 West Twenty-eighth street, has just returned from a four weeks' photographing trip. He brought back with him over a thousand 5 x 7 negatives for song slide work, among which were many beauties. Among the places visited by him in search of new scenery were the Swartwood Lakes, in New Jersey; the Delaware Water Gap, Shohola Glen, the Honks Falls Gorge, Hanging Rock Falls and Sams Point, at Ellenville, N. Y.; the Wyoming Valley, in Pennsylvania, and the Mayfield Hills, in Fulton County. The party consisted of Mr. Ingram, Mr. John Freileweh, Miss Teenie Ostrander, and Miss Jeanie De Forest, models. Other models were secured in the places visited by the party.

Mr. Ingram, in describing his trip, says that he saw some of the most wonderful scenery in America during the trip. At Honks Falls on the Rondout, in Ulster County, N. Y., he says, is the most wonderful work of nature he ever saw. The Rondout stream breaks suddenly through a gorge on each side of which there are great cliffs of magnesian limestone over one hundred feet high. Great cubes of rock have been dislodged from the cliffs by action of ice freezing into the crevices and have been tumbled down into the glen in the most picturesque confusion. Some of these blocks weigh thousands of tons.

But the most wonderful things at Honks are what are known as pot holes. These are circular holes bored into the soft limestone from the size of a stovepipe to ten feet in diameter, as regularly round as if bored with an auger. They are full of water and in some of them the bottom has never been sounded, while others have been sounded from one to three hundred feet in depth. These holes have been bored by the action of pebbles settling into depressions in the rock where they have been kept in circular rotation by the swirling water, for countless ages, boring down, down until they have reached an unknown depth where the process of boring is still in progress, and will probably continue till the end of time.

At the foot of Honks Falls, where it takes a sheer leap of 80 feet over the cliff, is a large whirlpool known as the bottomless pit. This is fully 70 feet in circumference and has been ground out like a great bowl. The bottom of this great pool has never been sounded, but pebbles that were without doubt great boulders at one time have been washed out as small and as round as marbles. When there is plenty of water coming over the falls this great and savage whirlpool swirls with incredible velocity and a great inverted cone of water the center of which, owing to the rapidity with which it whirls, is several feet lower in the center than on the edges. The Warwarsing Indians, a branch of the once all powerful Delawares, gave this whirlpool the name of "The Mouth of Hell," as anything that ever got into it was sucked down and never was seen again.

The great Ice Caves were visited, where, after entering the grotto, great icicles hang down from the roof of the cave often 50 feet in length and remain through the hottest of Summer weather. A stream of water colder than the coldest of iced water issues and runs down the mountain side.

Among the pictures brought home by Mr. Ingram were a great number of farm scenes, beautiful waterfalls, stretches of beautiful meadow and woodland scenes, mountain paths about Cragsmoor and beautiful flower gardens, old mills and many scenes taken on the top of Sams Point, 2,300 feet above tide water. We look forward to seeing some very interesting slides next season.

Stories of the Films.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE MENDED LUTE.—Moving picture stories based on the life and customs of the American aboriginals have ever been attractive, and we conscientiously doubt if there has ever been a more intensely interesting subject presented than this Biograph production which, indeed, is a masterpiece. Much thought and time were given the many details, and we may claim that as to costumes, manners, and modes of living, it is more than reasonably accurate, these details having been supervised by an expert in the matter. The Dakotas or Sioux Indians, when first visited by Jean Duluth in 1680, who claimed their country for the French, inhabited what is now North Minnesota, but were driven during subsequent Indian wars as far South as the present Sioux City, when in the war of 1812 they were allies of Britain. The incidents of our story are laid in the neighborhood of Spirit Lake, Ia., just previous to the outbreak, the first of which occurred in 1854, when Lieut. Grattan and his force were killed, the failure of the government to meet stipulations in land purchases being the cause. Owing to their roving, migratory nature, they were tent or tepee dwellers, expert horsemen and canoeists. Despite the general impression, they are highly emotional and poetic; yet with superlative power of dissembling, and the quaint love scenes herein depicted are unique in the extreme. Pretty little Rising Moon, the daughter of Chief Great Elk Horn, is wooed by Little Bear, and we meet them first at the foot of Snake Falls where they plight their troth to the music of the rumbling waters. Little Bear's worldly possessions are slim, and Great Elk Horn rejects his meagre offerings in favor of Standing Rock's rich gifts, and so Rising Moon is taken away by him to his wigwam, where she is left while her husband that is to be goes hunting. Taking advantage of his absence she steals away to the forlorn heart of her own choice, Little Bear, before it is too late. Standing Rock returning and finding her gone at once surmises the truth, and gathering his companions together, starts in pursuit. Little Bear and Rising Moon hearing their approach endeavor to make their escape. Pushing their way towards the river bank, with Standing Rock and his braves following, they leap into a canoe and are soon dashing along in the swift current of the mountain stream, which is in places the most dangerous of rapids. The feat seems ominous, but is safely accomplished, and was worthy of a better fate than capture, which they were later. Death of both is the reward, and they are bound together to this end. The ire of Standing Rock demanded more than mere death, so he proceeds to taunt and torture his rival. This is received with such stoicism by Little Bear, that Standing Rock is amazed to the point of admiration for the brave's fortitude, and not only cuts the cords that bind him, but bestows upon him the Eagle Feather, the highest honored gift to the brave, and bids he and Rising Moon to go and may they be happy. The subject as a whole is a combination of poetical romance and dramatic intensity, the canoe chases being the most picturesque and thrilling every shown. Length, 996 feet.

EDISON MANUFACTURING CO.

LOCHINVAR.—Sir Walter Raleigh's romantic story of the love that laughed at more than locksmiths, and to which even castle walls and haughty fathers were no bar, is told by the Edison Company with a wealth of scenic vesture and old Scottish atmosphere that brings out all its picturesque details.

We see young Lochinvar, who "rode out of the West," sending one of his retainers disguised as a peddler, to the fair Ellen, who, much against her will, has been betrothed to Douglas.

The retainer brings her a message of hope; yet the eve of her forced marriage arrives and no Lochinvar. But as the marriage festivities are in progress our hero appears before the castle walls and asks permission to congratulate Douglas.

After being disarmed he is admitted, and then during the one and last dance which he is permitted to have with Ellen, he suddenly seizes a sword from the wall, takes her in his arms, and before any one can stop him, breaks one of the high windows and carries her down the castle wall.

His swift horse is waiting for him below, and with Ellen in his arms he dashes off, hotly pursued by her father, Douglas and a castle guard.

Because his horse is the best in the land, the lovers succeeded in reaching the monastery so far ahead of their pursuers that when the latter arrive the ceremony has been performed and their pursuit is in vain.

The presentation of this story is full of vitality, life and good red blood, and one's heart must beat faster when watching its unfolding and its happy termination at the altar. Length, 790 feet.

THE TOBACCO EDICT.—In the early days of New York, when this whole district was known as New Netherlands, an early Governor, familiarly known as "William the Testy," issued an edict against the smoking of tobacco. The story of the effect this edict had on the burghers of the town is shown in Boughton's famous painting, but the real reason for the Governor's issuing the edict has never been made known until now. The rebellion of the burghers against the edict and their coming in a formal body to smoke out the Governor on his own doorstep is, in the Edison picture, supplemented by the story, understandable to every smoking man, of why the Governor sent out this unusual proclamation.

Old Dutch New York, with its quaint houses, costumes and characters, is reproduced here with human and comic touches that will appeal to any audience. Length, 999 feet.

ESSANAY MFG. CO.

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.—To our friend, William Shakespeare, we owe apologies only for the title of this amusing little skit, and great humorist that he was, we do not think he could have developed a funnier situation than is in this story.

Strange things happen in the course of marital bliss and it is not infrequent that the merest trifles cause the most turmoil. Our friend, Jones, loves his wife and carries her photograph in his overcoat pocket. In leaving a restaurant one evening, he accidentally exchanges overcoats with a gentleman who occupies the next table. The coats being identical in style, are easily exchanged without the owners' knowledge.

When Jones arrives home that evening, wifey goes through his pockets and brings out a photograph. But to her horror it is not her photograph but that of another woman. A similar discovery is made by the other man's wife.

Some interesting things happen when Mrs. Jones starts out to find the hussey whose likeness her husband carries, and when they finally meet there is such a stormy scene that a policeman, who luckily hoves in sight, separates them and takes them to the police station.

The husbands of the jealous wives are now sent for and the discovery of the exchange of the overcoats is made. All end happily and the Jones and Browns become fast friends.

This is a good story, overflowing with comical situations and will delight your audience.

THE MUSTARD PLASTER.—In this picture a man with a cold, an advising friend and two mustard plasters are the principal actors. Of course the star of the comedy are the mustard plasters.

A man suffering from a severe cold is advised by a well meaning friend to place mustard plasters on his chest and back, which will, his friend tells him, quickly relieve him of his cold.

The mustard plasters are purchased, and the man proceeds to do as the directions state, but he did not bargain for the hot time he was going to have. As luck would have it he picked out a very hot one and it immediately begins to have its effect.

He throws himself in front of the fire hose; he tries to cool off on the back of a sprinkling wagon. Nothing relieves him until finally he spots a cold storage warehouse, rushes in and goes into one of the refrigerators, and while he is freezing to death, two workmen rush in and relieve him of the mustard plasters. He then swears that he would much rather have a cold than mustard plasters on his back and chest.

KALEM MFG. CO.

TRACED BY A KODAK.—This picture makes an especial appeal to the children, but cannot fail to interest the children of a larger growth also. The heroine of the litle drama is Alma, the six-year-old daughter of young Doctor Norton, and in a series of charming scenes are told the adventures that befell her and her prize pony Nemo.

The opening scene gives us a view of a street in that section of the city given over to sales stables and horse dealers. The usual crowd of dealers, stable boys and loungers is gathered about. A sale is being made. Dr. Norton has decided to purchase a pony as a birthday gift for his little daughter Alma and is trying to make a suitable selection from the dealer's stock. One after another pony is brought forward only to be rejected by the Doctor. The dealer now plays his last card. He orders his stable boy to bring out the pony Nemo. Ah! here is what the Doctor has been seeking. What a handsome little fellow he is and how daintily he prances forward with his beautiful white cart. Here is a present that would fill the soul of any child with delight. The deal is soon made. After paying for the pony the Doctor gives the dealer his card, telling him to send the hill of sale to his home. Meanwhile a gypsy horse trader has approached, leading a large black horse. At the sight of the pony his eyes glisten with greed. Crowding up close to the Doctor, he quickly steals a card from the Doctor's pocket and disappears in the crowd. Now the Doctor climbs into the cart and drives away. The dealer and stablemen stand watching rather sorrowfully, for Nemo's gentle disposition and intelligence had made him the pet of the stable during his stay there and they hate to see him go. Now we see the Doctor driving along the road towards his home. Little does he think that only a short distance behind, keeping ever hidden by the trees, is the gypsy trader. How the gypsy succeeded in stealing the pony and its subsequent recovery is best told in little Alma's own words.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine.)

BABY IS KING.—Baby pictures are always well liked and this one will prove one of the most attractive of its kind, for it has the unsurpassed Urban-Eclipse photography to recommend it, as well as being a bright, well-acted subject.

Baby is monarch of the household, and wields his sceptre with tyrannical sway. Grandpa and grandma and mamma and nursey all try in vain to persuade the little rascal to go to sleep. He prefers to play, however, so at last they give it up as a hopeless task, their united efforts proving of no avail.

Thinking to tire him out with pleasure, they take him out for a walk. Baby again upsets their well-laid plans by becoming more wide-awake than ever. Unfortunately for his doting family, they pass a toy shop. Nothing will do for Mr. Baby except to have everything he sees; so grandpa proceeds to buy right and left until it seems as though baby has a toy shop of his own. On the way home, the little tyrant caps the climax by demanding that they buy him a donkey. They do so, and the little procession returns to the nursery. At last, baby is tired, and having had his every whim gratified, is ready to go to sleep. Length, 334 feet.

THE HIDDEN TREASURE.—Otto Kaufman, a widower, is discovered hard at work in the quarry where he is employed. His little boy brings him a letter from the lawyer of his deceased uncle. Upon reading it, he is amazed to learn that he has fallen heir to his uncle's estate. As the old man has always been reputed a miser with a vast fortune concealed in his house, Otto gives up his job in the quarry and goes to take possession of the home, hoping now to live a life of ease.

Otto's first act, after taking up his abode in the house, is to start a search for the hidden treasure. He and his little son search every nook and cranny with no success. Disheartened, after days of failure, Otto finally has to look for work again. It is much against his will to do so, for the whole neighborhood has expected to see him among them as a wealthy man.

He secures work on Farmer Bach's fruit farm, where he falls deeply in love with the farmer's pretty daughter, Katie. His love is returned, and he goes to her father asking permission to marry her. He is harshly repulsed on account of his poverty, and is discharged as well. He goes home in the deepest despair, and decides that life without Katie is worth nothing to him, so he determines to end his life. He writes a note to his sweetheart, telling her of his determination, and sends it by his little son. He then makes ready to end his troubles, preparing to hang himself from one of the rafters of his late uncle's cottage.

Katie and her parents are frightened on the receipt of Otto's note and the old people are remorseful. They all hasten to his cottage, arriving just as Otto suspends himself from the rafter. Fortunately, the rafter gives way and Otto falls to the floor amid a shower of bank notes and gold, which his miserly uncle had secreted in the ceiling. Needless to say, Katie's parents, now thoroughly reconciled to Otto, decide that a wedding is quite in order.

A very interesting subject throughout. Well acted. Length, 624 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

THELLYS' HEART.—The scenes of this beautifully mounted and artistically colored picture are laid in ancient Rome, where we see the young hero Ithis present himself before the father of pretty Thellys and ask for the latter's hand in marriage. Thellys enters the place upon the arm of her lover Cyclon, but as her father has given her to Ithis, she is torn from the side of Cyclon, and he is ejected from the place. When Thellys is presented to Ithis she will have none of him, but upon being threatened by her father, she reluctantly consents to go away with her new lover. Arriving at the latter's castle he tries in every manner to make love to Thellys, but she will not allow him to come near her. Finally Ithis gives up in despair and seeks diversion in gambling and carousing. His former sweetheart Fahtima tries to win back his affections, but he is so desperately in love with Thellys that he will not notice Fahtima. Finally the latter disgises herself as a man comes into the gambling den and throws dice with Ithis, who is unlucky at every turn and loses everything. Fahtima, desirous of having Thellys out of the way, proposes to Ithis that he stake Thellys' love in the game of chance. Ithis accepts the proposition, and although he plays a careful game, luck seems against him, and he loses. Disheartened, Ithis rushes out of the place leaving Thellys in the power of Fahtima, who immediately directs one of her servants to put an end to the poor girl. She is given over to a gruff fellow who leads her

THE BETTER WAY

A Beautiful Story of Puritan Times.

No period was more poetic and afforded more material for romance than the days of the Puritans, and this Biograph subject is a faithful portrayal of the quaint manners, honest character and picturesque costumes. The story is that of a Puritan girl, who, to help her poor mother, consents to marry an honest, tender-hearted old Squire, rejecting the young man whom she imagines she really loves. The young lover is persistent, however, and she is almost induced to go away with him, and, in fact, abetted by the Squire, who, regarding his age, would make the sacrifice. But she is suddenly awakened, and, realizing her lover's true character, halts before it is too late.

PREVENTS TIRED EYES AND HEADACHES

The rapidity of our new shutter has been so perfected that 30 to 40 per cent. less non-exposure (which has heretofore caused the tremulous vibration producing so many tired eyes and headaches) is found in the Motiograph than in any other machine, making perfect brilliancy of picture and sharpness of outline. Together with the rocklike steadiness of the pedestal the flicker is thus entirely eliminated.

Five-cent Theatre and Vaudeville-House Managers increase their bank account with the Motiograph. Patrons who come once will always come again where they know they see the best pictures, positively rest their eyes instead of tiring them, and where all fire risks are removed.

The Motiograph

1909 Theatre Model, Especially Approved by the Underwriters Association

OTHER POINTS OF EXCELLENCE IN THE MOTIOGRAPH found in no other machines are: A special Film Rewind by which the film can be rewound with the main crank in two minutes without removing either reels or magazines, saving time between pictures and entertainments; perfected Fireproof Magazines, Fire Traps, with four rollers and with spring actuated flanged guides, preventing side movement and making it impossible for fire to pass them; never failing Automatic Fireproof Shutters; Perfect Framing Device; Flanged Sprocket Rollers to prevent film being torn or ruined by accidentally running off sprocket wheels; Enclosed Gears and working parts; Perfect Take-up with new form of belt adjuster; Lid Off Wide Open Lamp House making it easily accessible; improved Arc Lamp with all Hand Wheel Adjustments; Slide Carrier Swing, saving one-third more illustration for the Motion Pictures.

Her old lover Cyclon, who has become a wanderer since the loss of his sweetheart, happens to pass by and to his great astonishment discovers his lady love. He rescues her and the happy couple are once more united by the power of love. Length, 968 feet.

THE TRAGEDY OF MEUDON.—Here is another example of a high class motion picture abounding in dramatic interest which is offered with such vitality and intelligence of purpose that it will take its place among the other art films as one of the greatest achievements in the history of the silent drama.

The dramatic thread of this little tragedy is the jealonsy of a woman toward her new daughter-in-law, and the artistic manner in which the different characters are portrayed is indeed commendable. The artists who play the respective parts are Hme. Aime Tessandier of the Comedie Francaise, Mr. Varennes of the Theater Rejane and Mlle. Barat of the Athenes, Paris, Frence.

The opening scene reveals the interior of a hntcher shop in the town of Meudon, France, where we see the industrious young butcher attending to his customers, while his mother, a comely woman past the prime of life, acts in the capacity of cashier. The general aspect of the place reveals an air of tranquillity and happiness, until the son who has recently beeu married, brings his young bride into the place. The mother up to this time has had no rival in her boy's affections, and now when the older woman sees part of the work in the little shop being assigned to the young woman, she becomes insanely jealous. From that moment the mother-in-law treats the young woman with utter contempt and makes her life unbearable, although the eider woman is diplomatic enough to act kindly toward her rival when in the presence of her son. The two woman have many disagreeable scenes, and things reach such a serious state that the young bride is forced to complain to her husband of his mother's harsh treatment, and threatens that unless the situation is altered he will he compelled to choose hetween his mother and wife.

The young man who is deeply grieved and horrified upon hearing the sad news, remonstrates with his mother, and tries to point out the proper course to pursue which will increase the happiness and content of all parties concerned. His talk with the oid lady has very little effect, for she hss made up her mind to cherish a hatred for the young woman who has supplanted her (as she imagines) in the affections of her only son.

The feud hetween the rivals finally reaches a serious climax. One day they are left alone in the shop, and the younger woman attempts to assume the duties in the cashier's desk. The old woman imperiously commands her to leave the place, and when the latter refuses to obey, the enraged mother-in-law attacks her. There is a lively scuffle between the two women, in which the younger one fares badly.

The next day while some peasants are at work in the field, one of the party finds the dead body of the young bride hidden under a hay stack. An alarm is sounded, and soon the whole village is upon the scene of the crime. One of the men finds a large butcher knife, the deadly instrument with which the crime was committed, and recognizing it as the property of the dead woman's husband, naturally, the blame of the terrible crime is at once thrown upon him. The lifeless form of the woman is carried to her late home, and when the bereaved husband is accused of the deed, he nearly goes frantic. But as the evidence points towards his guilt, he is led away to pay the penalty of the crime. His guilty mother stands by and lets the officers take the young man without uttering a word in his defense.

The next scene we see the old woman who has completely broken down beneath the weight of a haunted mind, and her guilty conscience has heen to much for her and she is suffering from a stroke of paralysis.

Before her eyes she continually sees the vision of the crime, and unable to bear up under the terrible anguish longer, she makes a confession of her guilt, when she receives a letter from her boy in which he telis her that he is condemned to die for a crime of which he is innocent. The guilty woman calls for a piece of paper upon which she writes, "My son is innocent, it was I who killed Charlotte." The confession is carried to the prison just as the young man is about to ascend the gallows. From that moment he is a free man, and is allowed to return to his home, where he finds his mother in an extremely weak physical condition. The officers come to arrest the guilty persons, hut too late; she has passed beyond the power of a mortal jurisdiction and entered upon that spiritual pathway which leads to the distant home where all are judged fairly. Length, 951 feet.

THE TWO PIGEONS.—This pair of young lovers whose romantic lives form the interesting subject of this richly colored picture, are seen in their simple little home where the devoted youth showers his attentions upon the simple little maiden. One day they have a slight disagreement, and while the youth is absent, another more gallant Romeo comes and induces the maiden to flee with him to the splendor of gay life which his riches can procure. The impulsive girl leaves a note on the table telling her lover that she will never see him again, after which she goes away with her new admirer.

The axiom, "All is not gold that glitters," becomes a stern reality, before many days have been spent in her new surroundings, and her tired and weary heart yearns for the pure love of the noble youth who she cast aside for one who soon proves himself unworthy of such a pure devotion. One day she finds her new lover in the company of another woman and is spellbound upon hearing him tell her the same tale of love which she, herself, has so often heard emanating from the same false lips. Enraged with jealousy, the maiden casts the many beautiful gifts at the false lover's feet and after denouncing him, she flees from the place.

Wandering back to the old familiar scenes she finds her first and only true love still waiting for her return, and feeling satisfied that the spendor of riches are transitory, she is satisfied to devote the rest of her life to the one who loves her truly. The youth overjoyed at her safe return gladly forgets the past and accepts the penitent maiden as his future wife. Length, 590 feet.

ARABIAN PILGRIMAGE.—This is a wonderful scenic film which will prove very interesting and beneficial as an educational subject. Like all such pictures it gives the public the privilege of seeing at close range the different inhabitants of the far off countries and gives them an opportunity to study the peculiar customs of the strange people. This picture shows a pilgrimage of the Mohammedans to Mecca and it is an inspiring sight to witness the devotion of the Arabs to the memory of their great prophet. Length, 295 feet.

robbed his partner. After a thrilling chase and fight Sam is captured and the miners are just about to hang him when "one of the boys" rushes up with the lost letter which he has found in the cabin. Sam is freed and the crowd cheer him.

The next days the miners gather at the lonely grave of Jim and after removing the head-board which states that Jim was murdered by his pal Sam, they put up a handsome monument the inscription on which does justice to Sam.

"EMPTY!"

Any pie faced dodo can advertise that he has "independent" films for rent, and for that reason you've got to use good judgment to avoid wildcatters who are pawning off a lot of useless junk under the name of "independent." Several exhibitors have told me they didn't want independent films because they have tried them and found them punk. When I asked what ones they had tried, I found invariably that they had been up against the fakirs. Get your independent goods from me, and you can bet your bottom simoleon you'll get the genuine. My reputation is too well founded to jeopardize it with stuff that I could buy at half price if I wanted it. And your theatre's reputation is too important to monkey with by using bum films. This is the Man that Writes the Plays that Makes the Name of CENTAUR Famous

JOSEPH A. GOLDEN.

What makes the ideal moving picture of to-day?

It must depict a drama or comedy as closely as possible those seen in the theatres.

As a consequence the man best fitted for producing the ideal moving picture story is a man who has had a broad experience in writing and staging plays.

No one disputes the fact that Mr. Joseph A. Golden is the peer of all his fellows in this particular field, and the Centaur Company, in which he is directly interested to-day, is, in the pictures it is issuing, obtaining all the ripe fruit of his experience of years in both the regular theatre and in picture studies.

There is no phase of the theatrical profession which he does not understand and know through his own practical experience.

Twenty-two years ago, under Dion Boucicault, he became initiated in this profession, and has since then played every kind of character, young and old, and of every nationality.

For years he served as stage manager to Charles Frohman—the greatest producing manager in the history of the theatre—and was for many years the stage director and manager of Stock Companies and other large productions.

For three years prior to his entering this profession he studied with Alberti, the greatest living pantomimist and teacher of stage craft.

He has worked under Wilfred Buckland, general director of David Belasco, with whom he acquired a mastery of stage decoration and make-up; studied stage dancing and ballet handling under Morari, and facial expression under Townsend Southwick. To perfect his play-writing talent, he worked under William Price, without doubt the greatest dramatic critic of the times.

It is easily seen that the education and experience which Mr. Golden has had, puts him before any one as a past-master in the production of the ideal moving picture.

To him must be credited the unusual success of the Biograph Company in their productions, for up until the time he entered the Centaur Organization, he had written for them and staged over 400 different productions, some of which, like "Terrible Ted," "Hypnotist's Revenge," "Tired Tailor's Nightmare," and "Deaf Mutes' Mask Ball," which were all real record-making successes, are the products of his pen and genius, and are still well remembered by many exhibitors.

Mr. Golden's entire time and attention at present is devoted to the writing and staging of Centaur pictures exclusively, and there are some good things in store for this Fall, which, without question will open the eyes of the American public as to what can be done by the proper man in the production of a moving picture, that will in itself be a complete play so perfectly enacted as to make one forget that it is a moving picture play instead of a regular staged production.

The Blacksmith's Daughter which is the latest from Mr. Golden's versatile mind, will be released by us on August 18. It is a story full of action from beginning to end, and one which will hold the attention of an audience during its entire length of approximately 975 feet.

The complete story is told in the bulletin which we issue, and which will be sent to any one requesting it.

REMEMBER THIS:

Before snow flies, everybody, including manufacturers, exchanges, exhibitors, and the general public, when motion pictures are spoken of, CENTAUR will be the first synonym they will give.

This Is No Threat—Its a Promise

The Natural Color Quest.

How the Problem Stands To-day.

Naturally colored moving pictures are in the air—very much in the air—just now both in this country and in Europe. Two processes on the Eastern continent are claiming attention and by one of them quite excellent results are, it is said, being shown. The technical and other journals are printing and reprinting, chiefly reprinting, articles on this fertile and fascinating theme, and generally speaking the trade throughout the world is agog as to the possible early imminence of the moving picture in natural colors.

Within the past few weeks we have been specially consulted by leading American film maanufacturers on the situation as regards the reproduction of moving objects in natural colors. They read so much in our European contemporaries on the subject that they are naturally disposed to think there is "something in" this widespread publicity. If we correctly judge the minds of our interlocutors there is a fear lest a good thing should be overlooked and that the long looked for process should elude the grasp of hands outstretched to seize it and make use of it. There need be no such fear: we all want moving pictures in natural colors, but the process by which they will be made has not yet been published in detail.

We have thought it advisable in the general interest to devote this article to a recapitulation of our criticisms of the published processes of natural color cinematography now before the world. Besides the manufacturers the whole world is concerned in the subject. If that large section of the world which is interested in moving picture making will read the following criticisms of the Friese-Greene and Urban-Smith processes they will be able to arrive at as a good an opinion as ourselves as to the practicability of those methods. We might say that the information which we have offered is taken from two articles published in our own pages earlier in the year. Owing to disturbing political causes those articles probably did not attract the attention they would have done in quieter times like the present.

The Urban-Smith Process.

The film is made panchromatic by suitable dyes, and it is exposed in the camera, behind a revolving shutter in which are fitted two filters (or screens) co'ored red and green. Thirty-two pictures a second are taken, one for each filter. When the negative is developed a positive is made from it and this is projected through red and green filters at the rate of thirty-two per second on the screen. The eye of the observer then perceives the moving picture approximately in the colors of nature. When he showed his results in London last year Mr. Smith appears to have supplemented the colors of his filters by adding color to the illuminant in his lantern—he colored the light, in fact—and the total effect on the screen was said to have been much admired.

In the hands of an ordinary moving picture photographer, unless he be of phenomenal knowledge and skill, the process is doomed to failure at the very start. Observe that a panchromatic film must be used—and made, For the information of those unversed in the chemistry and technique of the subject, a panchromatic film is one that has been sensitized for all rays of the spectrum; and it cannot be handled in an ordinary dark room. It must be placed in the camera in total darkness and it must be developed in total darkness, or the image will fog. Red light does not affect an ordinary moving picture film; red light would ruin a panchromatic film. The successful manipulation of panchromatic plates and films is one of the most difficult things in the whole field of photography. In moving picture work not one photographer in a thousand would (or could) successfully use panchromatic films, and the manufacturers would probably not take the trouble to make them.

The Smith process is hampered by enormous difficulties at the very start. Thirty-two pictures a second must be taken and projected, instead of about half that number. This is not a fatal drawback, but it is sufficient of a departure from ordinary practice to constitute a disadvantageous innovation, always a risky thing to attempt, for it involves some interference with existing methods. Then Mr. Smith colors the projection light. He is vague and unspecific on this point. In ordinary practice the idea would introduce error and vitiate the purity of the results, unless great care were exercised. This is a very weak part of the process, indeed: it is unsound; it is unscientific and it is empirical. You must not talk about coloring a light unless you give plain directions for doing so. To sum up, then, the Smith process though vastly ingenious and well thought out is, in its present stage, very difficult to work and can only be regarded as a valuable step forward.

A two-color process, as worked out by Mr. Smith, is certainly open to ordinary photographic criticism and the purist may reasonably object to such vague terms as "red" and "green" filters. Reds and greens are very numerous; and the spectroscope is a very useful instrument.

Taking the process as it stands, special provision would have to be made for it at very great expense, and it would have to be worked with extraordinary care. Nothing is said about the exposures. How much do the "red" and "green" filters increase the time? What is the H. & D. (or any other) speed number of the film? What dyes are used to render it panchromatic? What sort of lens is used—a specially computed apochromatic or what? How did Mr. Smith develop his negatives and with what? And the positives? What dyes were used for the screens? Is it a fact that persistence of vision is a function of color blending as well as of motion-blending?

THE FRIESE-GREENE PROCESS.

First of all, an orthochromatic film is placed in the camera for exposure. In the axis of the lens—that is, behind it and in front of the film—there is also fixed a prism of 20 degrees; next, immediately in front of the film are placed a red and a green screen, in the same plane as the image, that is, one above the other. So there we have the essential factors in the following order: 1, lens; 2, prism; 3, screens; 4, film.

The action of the prism is roughly to assist in passing two images instead of one to the image plane; this it does in virtue of the fact that it refracts some rays of light more than others, and consequently part of the image which passes through the primary lens is deflected to form the second of the two pictures placed one above the other. Both images pass through the screens, and when the positive is made from the negative those images in their turn are passed through other screens and a prism. Roughly the system for exposing the negative is that for projecting the positive.

An orthochromatic film is specified; how it is orthochromatised is not stated. About 3,000,000 dyes are available. The use of the prism is decidedly ingenious; it is doubtful if it will transmit a perfectly achromatic image. One of the pictures cannot therefore be sharp. With regard to the screens nothing is said as to the particular kind of dyes that are used. The process is ambiguous, and incomplete. Mr. Greene probably could produce good results according to the data given; we doubt if anybody else could. The one distinct novelty in it is the use of a prism for forming a second image, and there is doubt if that is wholly effective.

To use an orthochromatic film in moving picture work would entail special developing precautions, as the film is more or less sensitive to red rays, which an ordinary film is not. Then again, the exact reasons why an orthochromatic film is specified are not given. We cannot discover—for Mr. Greene does not say—what relationship it bears to the prism and the vaaguely described colored screens. The process here is obscure and unworkable. Now to the vital novelty of the system—the prism. It is doubtful if this can form a well defined second image, and if this is so the resulting picture on the screen cannot be quite sharp. The position of the prism would have to be carefully adjusted, a matter hardly to be left to the discretion of an inexperienced photographer. Optically the idea is so much of a novelty that more information on the point is necessary before a definite idea can be given of its practical value; but we incline to the view that it is not commercially workable. No information is given as to what colors are used in the taking and viewing films; a fatal omission, which needs no comment.

On the whole, then, it must be said that though the Friese Greene process is clever, and is possibly susceptible of being made commercial, in its present form it can only be compared to the Smith process, namely, as experimentally interesting. The use of a prism for forming a second image, thus making the process a two-color one, is the outstanding novelty of Mr. Greene's invention.

In the foregoing article we have endeavored to analyse the two natural color processes now before the moving picture world, pointing out their weaknesses from a practical standpoint and leaving it to the intelligent reader to determine for himself whether either process is one which a film manufacturer could take up without the necessity of having to modify or improve it. We think the conclusion obvious that judged by the ordinary requirements of every-day practice, neither process can yet be said to have arrived. Nevertheless, we cordially hope that both processes will be perfected by further experiment.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

CHAPTER XIV.—THE FILM.

There are comparatively few operators who thoroughly understand the proper care of a motion picture film and, judging from conditions, very few exchange men either. It seems hardly necessary to say that the film is a strip of specially prepared celluloid which comes from the maker in 200 and 400 feet lengths. This strip is 1⅜ inches wide and of varying thicknesses, though supposedly 6-1000 of an inch of which 1-1000 is the emulsion. On one side of this celluloid strip is a photographic emulsion, on which appears a succession of what are nothing more or less than photographic snapshots, ¾ by 1 inch, taken at the rate of about 1,000 per minute. There are 16 photographs to each linear foot of film, each taken about 1-16 of a second later than the next preceding. All this has been told so often that its repetition seems almost like waste of space, but the facility with which the most beautiful, as well as the poorest, examples of film develop into "rainstorms" is proof positive that, while some points concerning film may be well understood, others are not, since there is an amazing amount of ignorance or carelessness, or both together, displayed in the handling of films by both operators and inspectors. To such an extent is this carried that it amounts to nothing less than an outrage—an outrage against the owner of the film and against the public who pay their money to see a picture—not a bunch of junk. And the damage is fully nine-tenths due to just one cause and one cause only, viz., what is known as "pulling down," i. e., holding the reel stationary while revolving the reel to tighten the film roll. This, of course, causes the whole roll of film to slip on itself under considerable pressure, thus applying friction to both sides of the whole film. Now it seems to the writer that the commonest kind of horse sense ought to tell one what this will do to a film, particularly to the comparatively soft emulsion side. Look through the light beam and you will see that the air is constantly full of dust, and it does not require the wisdom of Solomon or an examination with a microscope to know that some of it is bound to adhere to the film, the more especially since celluloid, under combined influence of heat and friction of the tension springs, generates considerable static electricity. These particles of dust are very fine, but some of them are very hard and some particles contain metal, wihch is attracted by the electricity in the film. When the film slips on itself, in pulling down, these pieces become miniature plows, producing scratches coarse or fine, according to size and pressure. Of course, all dust particles are not large enough or hard enough to produce material damage, else we would have a film utterly ruined in a week of ordinary misusage, since they are present by the million. But the process is repeated many times in an ordinary day's run and then is duplicated at the exchange itself. What is the remedy, you ask? Well, it is very simple; but getting it applied is another matter entirely, since it involves a little more time and considerably more labor in rewinding—a job the operator cordially hates at best. Also it involves slower work by the inspector. Rewind slowly, applying considerable tension—at least as much as the average takeup supplies. That is all there is to it, since there would then be no reason to "pull down." One of the prolific causes of this pernicious practice is, however, too much film for the size of the reel. Reels are too small. Custom puts between 900 and 1,000 feet of film on a reel. This fills a 10-inch reel chock full with ordinary stock, and if the film happens to be a trifle thicker than ordinary it fills the reel more than full. Ten inches is too small. They should be 11 inches and no more than a thousand feet of film ever be placed on one reel. In some theaters where the work is rapid there is no time to rewind as above indicated and the operator has no choice, when running a thousand feet of film, except to pull down. With an 11-inch reel the necessity would not be present in nearly so great a degree, though with rapid rewinding either there must be no tension or else the labor is very hard. If there be no tension then the roll must be pulled down some or it will wind so loosely it will "flop." Rewinding should be done by motor in such cases and then the tension can be left on. I have dwelt on this matter, since I consider it one of vital importance—perpaps of more importance than any other one thing in the motion picture business to-day—and in time this will come to be recognized. There are other minor causes which contribute to the production of rainmarks, the principal one being the practice of holding the film flatwise between the thumb and fingers when rewinding. This does not produce deep scratches, but undoubtedly it is responsible for a multitude of very fine ones. Anything which applies friction to the surface of a film produces injury. There is at least one machine which still has idlers with a flat surface extending clear across. This is bad. Nothing at all should touch the film in its passage through the machine except on the track. Such idlers may do slight damage when properly adjusted, but unfortunately they are not always thus and, worse yet, are not always even revolving. Idlers of this type have been discarded on most machines and should be on all. Outside the damage done as above set forth there is little or nothing to injure a film either in its passage through the machine or at any other time except for wear of sprocket holes and tension spring marks. The writer asserts that, given a modern machine, in proper adjustment, he can run a film through, under ordinary show conditions (being given ample time for rewinding or given a motor for fast rewinding), 500 times and have scarcely a mark on it—not a single one that will be discernible on the curtain. To do this he would not, however, accept more than 850 to 900 feet of film on a 10-inch reel. Another thing I must mention in this connection, since it is productive of much damage to new films: some new film is quite stiff and has a decided tendency to rewind in the takeup in octagon shape, nor can this be prevented by any ordinary tension. It follows that it will do the same thing in rewinding unless heavy tension be applied to it or it is frequently pulled down. This condition is present only in new films on which the emulsion is, of course, comparatively green, soft and very easily injured. Even pulling down will not get it wound closely enough but that a thousand feet will very much overrun a 10-inch reel. There is room for display of at least ordinary intelligence, on the part of exchange men, in the stock placed on a 10-inch reel, if they care anything at all about their own property. In running new film (first run) the emulsion is often green and soft, with decided tendency to deposit on the tension springs. This matter should be closely watched when running first run film. If the deposit is bad it will sometimes evince its presence by a jerking of the springs, but not always. Carefully examine the surface of the tension springs after each run and don't forget it. The deposit, if allowed to remain, will make a bad tension spring mark the entire length of the film. After much experimenting the best preventive the writer has been able to discover is to rub the springs with an ordinary tallow candle before each run. Uusually this will prevent deposit, but not always. In removing deposit be very careful not to roughen the spring or you will then have trouble and plenty of it. Every film should have a tail piece 2 feet long, but a 3 to 4-foot leader is an imperative neeessity under present conditions, since it takes from 2 to 3 feet to thread into the takeup. If the title is of ordinary length, even with a new film, by the time you have threaded, started your machine, centered your light and framed up, the audience is left to wonder what in thunder the picture is anyhow, the title being "all in." But this does not apparently interest the average exchange man, who seemingly is only concerned in "getting the money." I will therefore endeavor to show him where he would actually save money by putting on a leader and thus attempt to touch his heart through his pocketbook. Almost any old film will do for leader, while title is worth good money. In threading into the takeup the average operator folds the film end on itself an inch a couple of times and then thrusts it under the reel clamp. Now in rewinding what happens? I'll tell you. If the reel clamp be stiff this folded end may pull off instead of pulling out and there is something like two inches of film (title) gone. Anyhow when the film pulls off it usually whips around from once to half a dozen times, according to the carefulness (or carelessness) of the operator, and what is done to the title would be a shame to tell. It is safe to say each operator who runs it will amputate from 1 to 4 inches during the time it is in his possession. Now, Mr. Exchange Owner, wouldn't it be cheaper for you to have that much junk leader lost each deay than have your title gradually eaten away, thus depreciating the value of the film until a new one is attached? But, say you, "operators persistently steal leaders." Yep! that's so, old man. Can you blame them? They well know that if they are fortunate enough to get a film with a leader on to-day it's a moral certainty the one they get to-morrow won't have one or will have one too short. Send out all films with not less than 3 feet of leader, preferably 4, and notify operators that all films will be so equipped. Just as soon as operators discover you mean what you say you will find leader stealing will stop. They will have no cause to take them! Moreover, you can put a stop to it by charging leader up at the rate of 2 or 3 cents a foot—or even more. By thus equipping your film and keeping the leaders proper length your titles will last just as long as ony other portion of the film.

And now I come to something that will interest you, Mr. Exchange Man. Do you know how operators get leaders when you won't supply them? I'll tell you a state secret! Mr. Operator has to have a leader for his film. He proceeds to get it—how? Very simple. He runs it once without leader and then he amputates one anywhere he thinks a jump won't show in the body of the film. He has his leader and you would have to do some mighty close inspecting and comparison to catch up with it, old man. You don't think this is done much? Well, there are probably several things you don't know yet and this is just one of them. It serves you right, too. Equip your films as they should be and the practice will stop. You can't stop it in any other way. Film exchange men can well afford to take this matter up seriously, for lack of leaders, now that takeups have become of general use, is costing them far more dearly than they know or realize. Nine operators in every ten are wise to the above scheme and they get the necessary leaders that way, too, though they wouldn't know a single thing about such a thing if you asked them—dear me, no! We have had a good many "Associations" in which film renters have played a prominent part, but the writer would suggest, humbly and in all seriousness, that an organization to teach them how to care for their own stock would be a blessing both to them and to those who use the films.

Making mends is another matter of great importance and it is a somewhat sad fact that not one operator or film exchange inspector in fifty makes a perfect patch. The operator is to be excused to some extent, since he seldom has time to do the matter rightly. But what about the exchanges? In only one exchange in all Chicago has the writer seen a film properly mended. That's a tough statement, but true. Let it be understood that film cement when properly used welds the film as much as it glues it. To properly make a patch it must have the heavy, even pressure of a clamp for 4 or 5 seconds. A properly made mend is not more than 1/8 inch wide and is nearly as strong as the original stock. To make such a patch as this, however, is usually impractical in an operating room; but there is absolutely no excuse on the face of the earth for the exchange making any other kind. Nor is there any excuse for an operator not making a reasonably narrow, strong patch. Proceed as follows: Cut your film as per Fig. 34, making stub end A not to exceed 3-16 inch long, and cutting end B exactly on dividing line between two pictures. Cutting the film any other way will cause a misframe. Now lay a small metal straightedge in position shown by dotted lines, Fig. 34. With a sharp knife scrape the emulsion from the stub right up to edge of straightedge, scraping right down into the celluloid until a rough, whitish-gray surface is produced. Be sure to scrape well around the sprocket holes, since this is where the patch usually begins to loosen. Now turn end B over with emulsion side down and, again using straightedge, scrape back of film for a space about equal to width of stub end A. This latter proceeding is very important, since there is likely to be oil on the celluloid, but even if there is not, the patch will not adhere nearly so well if back of film is not well scraped. It takes a very sharp knife to do the scraping properly. Now, being sure to have emulsion sides of both ends either up or down, apply your cement liberally to the stub end and, working fast, since cement evaporates rapidly, join the two ends so that the end B just covers stub A. Match the sprocket holes perfectly and press the patch together firmly, applying all the pressure you can for a few seconds, when the cement will have set and the patch is finished. Be very sure to get your sprocket holes properly matched, as they are your guide, and unless they fit together the mend will be crooked or two holes will be too small, causing a jump as the film goes through the machine. It may also cause the intermittent to climb a couple of sprocket holes, thus producing a misframe. A film mender with a pressure clamp is a fine thing if you have the time to use them—without the clamp they are merely a nuisance. They are hardly a practical appliance in an operating room. In making patches watch closely the following points: Get emulsion on same side on both ends. Scrape well and apply plenty of cement, especially around sprocket holes. Be sure the sprocket holes match perfectly. There has been some argument as to whether a patch should be made as per "C," Fig. —, or "D," Fig. —, but the writer believes it makes no material difference. A good film cement may be had from any film exchange, or may be made as follows:

Ether	1 oz.
Commercial collodion	3 oz.

Should you by accident get the film wet, no matter how wet, it will receive no material damage if you immediately unroll it and stretch it in such manner that the emulsion touches nothing until it is dry. This does not apply to colored or tinted film, though even this may sometimes be saved by prompt action. But the unrolling must be done very quickly.

When it is desired for any reason to remove the emulsion from film it may be done by soaking in warm water to which has been added sal soda (common washing soda will do). Use plenty of the soda and let the film soak for say 15 minutes, and you can then wash the emulsion off easily. It may also be removed by soaking in ordinary cold water and then scraping. Proceed as follows: Soak the film until emulsion is soft. Lay film, emulsion side up, on a flat board or table and draw it under the blade of a knife. If the knife blade is long enough and the edge straight enough the whole surface of the film will be cleaned at one "swipe." Film should, so far as possible, be kept in a cool, moist place, though the matter of moisture may be overdone. If you get too much of it the emulsion will stick to the pack of the film. It is a mere waste of breath telling operators not to keep spare film near the ceiling of a hot operating room. They will keep it where it is most convenient. However, films not on the machine should be kept in a solderless metal box or cabinet located near the floor, and if fastened to the wall it should be so attached that it may be instantly lifted away and carried outside in case of fire. Where a film tank is used it is well to have the bottom covered with a coarse screen held an inch from the bottom by wooden or metal cleats. In the bottom of the tank keep some water to which has been added just a little glycerine—one part of glycerine to 33 of water is about right. This will be very beneficial to the films. Old, brittle film may be made pliable as follows: Get any metal can large enough to hold a film when unrolled loosely. The can must have a tight cover. Cover the bottom with a coarse screen, leaving an inch or two below it. Into this space place a mixture of water and glycerine as above. Unroll the film into the can and leave it in a moderately warm room for from one hour to half a day, according to condition of film. Examine it frequently. Don't leave long enough to soften the emulsion too much. Another way is to give the film a bath in the aforenamed solution. To do this build a drum by nailing lattice lath around a couple of barrel heads. Place the solution in a washtub or other suitable receptacle and immerse the film in it, winding immediately on the drum with emulsion side out. The drum should be geared so as to run fast enough to throw off all surplus liquid. Be very careful in handling the film after it is wet, as the emulsion is then soft and the least scratch will play havoc with it. This operation must be done in a room where there is no dust. Sprinkle the floor well before commencing. It will perhaps be best for the novice to place the liquid in a long, shallow pan, merely drawing the film slowly through the mixture as it is wound onto the drum. The drum must be revolved until the film is dry. Glycerine absorbs moisture rapidly and that is the reason it is beneficial to a film. Don't use more than one part to 33 of water, however.

When you have an old film with a short title, put on a good, long leader, attaching so it is in frame with the title. Frame up on the leader and when the title comes it will have to be very short if the audience cannot catch it, provided you run slowly. Right here let me caution you to always start your machine slowly. If you start fast and have to frame on the title it is gone before there is any chance to read it, especially if it be a short one. When the operator has the opportunity he should invariably inspect his film before running it the first time, cementing all loose patches and making any other needed repairs. An ounce of prevention in this respect is worth several hundredweight of cure. The inspection given films in some exchanges is very largely a matter of vivid imagination. If the film isn't clear in two somewhere it is enthusiastically O. Ked by the inspector, who is expected to "inspect" (???) a thousand feet of film in ten minutes or less. I know I am roasting the exchanges a good deal, but unfortunately it is all "coming to them"—or to some of them, rather. Those the shoe doesn't fit need not wear it. In looking over film unwind into the tank or takeup and rewind slowly, holding film by edges with pressure enough to "cup" it. You will thus by sense of touch be able to detect all broken sprocket holes and loose patches. If more than two sprocket holes are missing in one place, cut it out. In case you should ever get caught without cement, an emergency substitute may be had in ordinary liquid glue. Proceed as you would with cement, but use the glue instead. Don't put much on, though, and give it ample time to dry. This should only be done in case of emergency, however, as it is by no manner of means good practice and makes but a very, very poor job at best. You can measure the exact length of a film by running it through a machine, counting the turns of the crank. The Power's, Edison, Motiograph, and, I believe, the Lubin, also, pass exactly one foot of film to each turn of the crank. The Viascope passes nine inches. And now let me call your attention to the fact that, at a normal speed of 60 feet per minute, 960 separate and distinct photographs must stop dead still—dead still, without a quiver or particle of vibration, each occupying precisely, to the thousandth of an inch, the exact space filled by its predecessors—each minute. It requires slight discernment to see that to accomplish a result so marvelously rapid and accurate not only the mechanism, but the film itself, must be in good condition.

The writer has had hundreds of letters asking why some new films apparently sway sidewise with rhythmical motion and others continually jump on the screen. The first named fault, usually attributed to lost motion in the camera, is due to the use of a rotary perforator. The last named fault lies in the perforation also. It would occupy much valuable space to enter into detailed explanation as to the exact why and wherefore and could accomplish no corresponding good. Old, dry films jump because (a) the sprocket holes are shrunken, (b) sprocket holes are worn.- The first named fault may be remedied by moistening the film as before set forth. Films will jump more or less when run on a machine with worn intermittent sprocket teeth or where the star movement is too loose; also, they will jump badly when run on a finger feed machine the fingers of which are worn. The film gradually cuts a little groove in the fingers on the under side. It is hardly discernible until they are taken out and closely examined, but the effect is there just the same. Remember that with a fifteen foot picture a jump of 1-1000 of an inch becomes 180-1000 on the curtain, while 1-64 inch would become almost three inches. In other words, a fifteen foot picture magnifies the film photo 180 times its diameter, and it follows that any defect is magnified that many times also. From this you may see how absolutely accurate must be the perforation of a film to secure an absolutely steady picture. The marvel is that old films run as well as they do, the more especially when run on a worn machine.

In closing this subject, I believe it well to give a very brief, crude description of the way a motion picture film is made. Celluloid is a composition of pyroxylin and camphor, the latter being nothing more or less than ordinary cotton which has, by a bath of nitric and sulphuric acids mixed in nearly equal proportions, been converted into gun-cotton. But it must not be inferred from this that celluloid is in any degree whatever explosive, for it is not. A certain mixture of pyroxylin and camphor, dissolved, or partially so, in alcohol or ether, produces the crude celluloid, which may appear as lumps in the bottom of the acid tanks or in blocks in a press, according to detail of manufacture. The crude celluloid is worked by cold and then by hot steel rolls and is then subjected to prolonged, heavy pressure, after which it is dried in kilns for several days. It is now in the form of cakes, which are worked into strips 200 feet long by 22 inches wide. A machine next coats this strip with the photographic emulsion by passing it beneath a hopper filled with emulsion, in the bottom of which is a narrow slit. Another machine now splits the 22-inch strip into ribbons 1⅜ inches wide, which are then ready for sale to the film photographers, or film makers, as distinguished from film stock makers. The film stock maker only perforates such stock as is ordered perforated, since film makers usually do their own perforating. The perforating is done by a punch press, of which there are several kinds. Some are rotary, some punch two, one hole on each side, and some punch four at a time. There are exactly four perforations to each ¾ inch of film. The film is fed to the press by an intermittent movement or by a pawl and ratchet. Negative films (the ones the photographs are taken on) have a much "faster" emulsion than have the positives. Such is a rough sketch of the process of manufacture of motion picture films, and one has but to glance at the constituent parts of celluloid to understand why it is so inflammable. Just what changes in manufacture are brought about by the new non-inflammable film the writer does not know. All he knows about it at this time is that a different cement is required for it than was used for the old stock.

Bellevue, Ohio.—W. J. Fry has sold the Theatorium Motion Picture Show to Willis Dewalt, of Tiffin.

The National Waterproof Film Company, 2115 West Adams street, Chicago, send us a sample piece of film which has been treated by their process. After putting it to the most severe test we can only say that the emulsion side of the film is rendered absolutely proof against water, either cold or warm, and the enameling also serves as a protection against scratches. The ease with which film may be cleaned, the freedom with which it may be handled and the extended time of its usefulness in good condition are features which should commend this process to the attention of all film exchanges.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

Laemmle, the original, is springing a new one. In an advertisement he says he hears that moving picture operators are being treated shamefully in New York when they call at some of the renting exchanges. He promises them the finest and squarest treatment on earth when they call at any of his exchanges. No other man in the picture business has a keener sense for novelty in advertising than the Chicago man, and in no advertiser is the "ego" more strongly and effectively personified than in Laemmle. But it is not my intention to figure as press agent for the Chicago wonder. I merely wish to repeat some of the sentiments I heard expressed by exhibitors after they had read his advertisement.

An East Side exhibitor wanted to know if Laemmle was a new one, or had he just returned from a tour of foreign lands covering several years. He could not be convinced that one or the other was not the case, because otherwise Laemmle would not be preparing pink teas and lawn parties for the reception of operators. The exhibitor also remarked that it is a good thing Laemmle has not got the wealth of Rockefeller, Carnegie, or some of the other multi-millionaires, for in such an event nearly all the picture houses would have to close. With such a generous man at their back few operators would care to turn the handle. He added that the only reception he maintains for his operators is one with a main feature in the form of a vocabulary that would not look well in print. He admitted that possibly all operators are not alike, but insisted that his experience had been a trying one. When his show is not delayed by the operator's late arrival the exhibitor pinches himself to see if he is awake. Every girl who enters the place has an effect upon the running of the machine. If the operator has not got his eye glued to one of the peep holes of the booth, or his neck has not assumed a goose-like shape, then on goes the "One minute intermission for a change of reels" slide. That operator is bound to find out who the girl is, whether he has ever met her before, and whether he cares to see her again. You can't beat them, this exhibitor says, and the way they can grind up the reels towards the closing of the show when they have a date to keep is a marvel for rapidity. I have tried several, said the exhibitor. Whether it is my luck, or I am an easy mark, I cannot say, but I do know that every one I landed proved a Don Juan. The funny part of it is that when I discharged them they took my act with the utmost indifference, in fact they appeared to welcome a discharge. I could not understand it, until I had let a number go and then I recalled that right after each one left several people would hang about the place, spy into the coop and in a mysterious way ask what had become of the other young fellow I had operating for me. I am wise now and when I employ an operator I give him the third degree as to whether he is romantically disposed. Our wardman tells me he has more broken hearts on his hands than the breach of promise courts could heal in years."

A film exchange proprietor's remarks were of a more serious character when he spoke of the Chicago man's innovation. He said in substance that it was inspired by either one of these two motives, or possibly both: Laemmle wants to get the operators talking about him and his new exchange, or he wants to get about him the pick of the men. A good man, an operator who understands his business and attends to it, neither asks or expects unusual favors. The operator who is careful and prompt in his work and looks after the interests of his employer as well as his own acquires a spirit of independence that makes him peculiarly popular and he always has work and good pay. The other kind of an operator is of little use anywhere and nothing will change him. He works when, where and as he pleases and in nine cases out of ten will be found working only for personal gain and without the slightest consideration for his position or the man who pays him. The almost indiscriminate granting of operators' licenses has allowed to crawl into the fold a large number of youths and men who are really unworthy of the privilege. This exchange man was very sore when speaking of the matter. He pointed out that scores of operators are engaged in a widespread system of graft whereby exchanges that are dealing fair with exhibitors and giving the best possible value for the money received are being robbed of their customers, and at the same time the exhibitors are being deluded and injured by the same tactics. The system was described as a prearranged plan to get the exhibitor for whom he is working to change his patronage to an exchange that is willing to pay the operator a bonus of so much each week as long as the customer is held. This kind of an operator is not loyal even to the exchange that gives him the bonus. If another exchange comes along and offers a better bonus the system is put in operation again and in a short time, presto! and another change is made.

I asked this exchange man if much of what he had said was not based upon imagination and if it were possible that any exhibitor would allow an operator to juggle his business in this manner. I also stated that I had heard such reports before, but when I inquired at film exchanges as to the truth of them was assured that no exchange would tie itself up with an operator in that manner. His answer to this was first, there are some exhibitors who understand the moving picture business, pay strict attention to it, and carry out the details entirely independent of their operators, who are required to confine their attention strictly within the zone of their duty. None of the exhibitors, in all probability, know of the system spoken of and look upon the changes as made in good faith and with a view to the advancement of their own interests; but there are many exhibitors who have entered the business as novices and depend in a large measure upon the judgment of their operators until experiments and experience reveal the real situation of affairs. Other exhibitors place this reliance upon the operators through a feeling of confidence planted and nurtured by good service rendered by their operator. By this is meant, that a man may be an expert operator, but in all other respects be a counterfeit. Secondly, it is natural that no film exchange will admit securing business through the bribing of a competitor's operator. It may also be true that no exchange as such does such a thing, but that it has been and is done by representatives of exchanges, sometimes by other operators detailed for that purpose, is a most positive certainty. It is well known among the operators and equally well known among the exchanges. The system has frequently worked itself out by a combination of circumstances that has brought the exhibitor back to the film exchange he originally dealt with, and time and again the operators themselves have declared the turning of the tricks either in boasting or in threatening the exchange he acted for.

An operator who had his attention drawn to the magnanimous declaration in Laemmle's advertisement was almost hilarious in his commendation of the move. "Say, boss," he exclaimed, "when does de Marathon start? I want ter be first at de finish. I'm in training any time fer a go like dat. Does de eats an' de drinks go wid it? O, but dat Chicagee guy is a sparkler! I could wear him on me finger all de long, long season and never hock him. I often heard of de second comin', but I didn't tink it was comin' so soon. Dis is certainly grand. And are all de machine grinders in de invite? Yes! Well, well! I see dat feller right away before de carpets get worn down and de lemonade gets a second dose of water. I want to shake his mit and tell him what I tink of him. I want ter be his friend, and stick ter him like me long lost brudder, fer he certainly looks good ter me."

By "Lux Graphicus."

Most of us when riding in railway trains find time occasionally hang heavy on our hands. You can't smoke, read, talk all the time. At least I can't. The tobacco palls, the book becomes tiresome and I weary of the sound of my own voice and the other fellow's. 'Specially if the other fellow happens to be a he and a bore. If the other fellow is a she and isn't a bore—and no nice she is a bore—why, I wouldn't tire of talking to the sweet thing for a month of Sundays. Not me.

Then if you can't smoke, read or talk you can walk about or drink water or sleep. Life is a varied thing on a train. I'd got through this programme on a trip the other day when I thought I'd make an addition to it by looking outer winder. Out of the window, as we should pronounce it, but often don't. And as I looked I saw green fields, sky, clouds, trees, cattle, houses, people and advertisements. Particularly advertisements.

You know the sort of thing. "Bull Durham," "Mennen," "Postum," and the entire hierarchy of mural potentates. Well, as I looked and looked in an aimless sort of way I saw the words "motion pictures" suddenly stand out from the mingled mass of color printing, design and size. So I looked again at those words and in far less time than I am taking to write these two lines I realized the fact that I was looking at a very large poster advertisement of a moving picture theater.

Not much of a fact to write about, you may at first blush be inclined to say, dear Reader. But it is. That poster is a straw which shows the direction of the wind. That poster was pasted up on a hoarding many miles from a large city. That poster advertised moving pictures quite as largely and effectively as a poster advertises a stage play. That poster shows as conclusively and as completely as it is possible to do that the moving picture is competing with the talking play at all points of the game.

And as I look at the straw again I perceive that the wind is blowing very strongly indeed. Here in New York City I recall the fact that during the past few months the Fourteenth street theaters and the Majestic Theater have all put out posters which are widely advertised throughout the city. What does that indicate? Simply that, in the minds of the men who run the m. p. theaters to-day, the moving picture public is the public at large—not merely the women or children or both, but everybody and anybody with whom amusement is a matter of serious importance.

That country poster, staring at me far far away in the loneliness of a distant State, set me thinking of certain undeveloped possibilities in the way of moving picture theaterdom to which I will refer another time. Meanwhile I bring it to the notice of the enterprising moving picture theater exhibitor as a point to be acted on. I'm one of many. I'm one of the great public always on the qui vive for the newest and when I see a moving picture theater advertised on the walls or hoardings, trust me but I am moved by such enterprise and I burn to spend my nickel in recognition of it.

Where does all this tend? Simply to the more enlightened aggrandizement of the moving picture amongst the great outer public that still has to fall under the fascinating sway of the Silent Drama. When the existence of good moving pictures is known everywhere and by everybody then everybody will go to see them. The m. p. public is—or soon will be—the world at large. Here in this connection I would like to say a good word for the admirable work Keith & Proctor are doing in advertising their picture shows. The many thousands of people who pass their houses day by day see tastefully designed boards on which the names and nature of the day's films are printed. Some day every moving picture house will do this.

"Nearly All from America."—Mr. P. R. Salmon, F. R. P. S., writes us from London: "The moving picture craze is still going it strong here. I have been several times to our local show and the films are nearly all from America. I do not remember seeing a British film."

THE NATIONAL MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITORS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Is the title of an association that has been incorporated at Albany. The purpose of the new association is to meet all criticism against the entertainment they may provide by combining against what they style "unwarranted municipal espionage" and at the same time begin a campaign of education to prove that they are anxious to cater to the respectable element and that they will select their exhibition films accordingly.

The new corporation will begin missionary work at once. It is a part of their programme to print interviews with family heads in every locality to prove that little children are taken by parents to the exhibitions, and that films are not only perfectly moral, but edifying.

The new corporation will also provide for work among city officials. Invitations will be sent to all to attend any of the houses included in the corporation, announced or unannounced.

The officers of the new corporation, which embraces several hundred of the moving picture concerns in all of the boroughs, are: President, William McKenzie; vice-president, Gustav Koenigswald; secretary, Frank McCutcheon; treasurer, Louis Maas; organizer, Arthur D. Jacobs.

Gustavus A. Rogers, who made a strong fight against Mayor McClellan in the movement to close the moving picture places and who secured the order that defeated the Mayor in his attempt to keep the houses closed, is attorney for the corporation.

The membership will be increased from every city in the State. It is expected 5,000 moving picture concerns will become a part.

RETURNED FROM OBERAMMERGAU.

Mr. Henry Ellsworth, the lecturer, has just returned from Oberammergau, in the Bavarian Alps, in Germany, where the original "Passion Play" is produced every ten years.

Mr. Ellsworth, when in Oberammergau, had an interview with Burgomaster Sebastian Bauer, who told him that at least half a hundred moving picture concerns had offered large amounts of money to be permitted to photograph the "Passion Play" next Summer, but if they offered all the money in the world it would never be permitted.

Mr. Ellsworth brought back many new scenery pictures which he will use in his lectures this coming season. His new slides are now being made by the Henry B. Ingram Company, by the wet collodian plate process.

Mr. Ellsworth looks well and hearty and gives a vivid description of the ravages of the earthquake ruins in Messina, Sicily, and vicinity. He saw a real Spanish bull fight at Barcelona, at which eight bulls and twenty-seven horses were killed. He said it was the most brutal and unsportsman like scene he had ever witnessed.

Death or sickness not preventing he will sail for Oberammergau early next Summer to witness the "Passion Play," and will be away about five months. The initial performance will take place on Whit Monday, May 16, 1910, and the concluding performance will be Sunday, September 25, 1910.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

The Moving Picture on the "Regular" Stage.

Mr. Cyril Maude, the well known English actor manager, is adopting the moving picture as an aid to business. According to The Referee (London) last week he gave his usual seven performances of Mr. Fagan's Florentine farce at the Playhouse; and appeared in "French As He Is Spoke" at Tuesday's Thespids' matinee there. And when the present writer caught Mr. Maude in his dressing room on Thursday evening, getting into his pads for the fat nobleman in "A Merry Devil," he had just finished playing Eccles at the St. James' special matinee of "Caste," by way of assisting in the compliment paid by sundry other stars to the author's daughter.

Questioned as to his future arrangements, Mr. Maude proceeded to state that at the end of the present run of "A Merry Devil" he will go on a ten weeks' tour, taking along "The Flag Lieutenant" only.

"And a cinematograph," he added mysteriously.

"What's the cinematograph for? Why, to serve by way of curtain raiser and to show the provincials all the best pictures the Urbanora firm has been able to take of the British fleet.

"By this means we hope to show our friends in the provinces what the navy is like. And so, together with instilling patriotism, we shall also prepare them for 'The Flag Lieutenant,'" added the favorite comedian with his favorite wink.

THE MOVING PICTURE IN AUSTRALIA.

(From The South Australian Register.)

In March last Mr. Leopold Sutto, the Australian representative of Pathe Freres, the great film producers, went to France to make arrangements for the establishment of a branch manufactory in the Commonwealth, and to transact business in connection with the contract with the Commonwealth Government to advertise Australia. When he returned, he told a representative of the paper that his trip had been eminently satisfactory. As a result of his visit a branch —the forty-first established by the firm—will be opened in Melbourne on July 1, and the board of directors has under consideration the advisableness of opening a small factory similar to those in Paris, London and New York.

"What has influenced the company to turn its attention to Australia?"

"It is this. We are going to take pictures of the Commonwealth on a most extensive scale. Australia is a big field for exploitation, and offers exceptional facilities for business. Besides, attention is being turned to Australia by Europeans generally, who want to know more about the country. They look to us to enlighten them. We are going to try."

A Big Industry.

"The bioscope business is quite an industry now?"

"Yes. When I tell you that the Australian branch will be the forty-first offshoot of the company, you will conceive its proportions. In Paris alone 6,000 people are connected with the industry. Of course, Australia will not be able to point to such figures. There will, however, be work for a good few. If we keep our own special artistes for 'fake' pictures, and get together the necessary costumes and other gear; if, in fact, we enter thoroughly into the business, as in France, then it will be different. We do not intend for the present to give such scope to our work. For the time being we shall deal in realism alone, and there are heaps in Australia to interest not only Australia, but to cast a spell over European audiences."

An Educational Medium.

"The uses of the bioscope are more than entertaining now?"

"Yes. It is a force—and a powerful factor at that—in the education of the young, and is also recognized as one of the best advertising mediums. It has what you may say passed from the initial and experimental stages, and is now a factor of prime importance—commercially, industrially and educationally. About three years ago people went to a picture show just to laugh; now they go for more potent reasons. The bioscope has become the school of to-morrow. No more nced people go simply to laugh at it. It is doing for the present generation what photography did for the past, only it is much more realistic, because it is animated, and stamped with the hall-mark of genuineness. To-day the life of a far away country can be brought to the threshold of every home. These living pictures of the life of other cities, of other countries, and of other people are going to be the greatest draw in the future. The comic make-believes will be there also, but theirs will be the secondary part."

Color Cinematography.

"The broadening scope of the bioscope is doubtless leading to research, in the hope of depicting incidents as true to color as they are to life?"

"We have already succeeded in doing that. I have with me a machine capable of making films with natural colors. The coloring is done by the machine itself, which displays intelligence perfectly human in its wonderful conception. Moreover, the work can be done at practically the same cost as before. As showing what Pathe Freres think of the potentialities of Australia, I may tell you that the machine with me is the first that has gone out into the world. Australia will see these colored films before any other people in Europe, Asia, America or Africa. There is another invention which has not been made public yet, and it is going to revolutionize matters to some extent. It will not be out for another six months, and I am not at liberty to speak of it."

"Will the new process be used in connection with the pictures taken to advertise the Commonwealth?"

"Yes. I have succeeded in obtaining a further concession in that direction. My firm has given me authority to use the process for such purpose. Although the colored films will not be taken in all cases, I hope to have colored pictures of the majority of the incidents treated. By the bye, the taking of the pictures will be completed in about a fortnight."

Advertising the Commonwealth.

"And the method of advertising. On what basis are you treating the individual States?"

"Every State is being covered in proportion to its population, its commercial activities, its status generally, and the scope of subjects for our purposes. While away I visited the latest showing firms in England, Germany, France, Switzerland and Italy, and the managers are all anxious to secure the Australian pictures; firstly, because they represent a country which is not known at all, or only a very little, and because Australia is exciting great interest; and, second, because subjects for pictures are becoming more scarce. I took away with me a picture showing the railway system of Melbourne, with six trains crossing in the station yard. That has already been shown in Europe, and has excited much interest. It is our intention to manufacture at least 200 copies of each picture. This will be done in Paris. A copy of each will be forwarded to each of our forty-one branches. These will supply the largest shows in the leading cities of the world. They will then gradually pass from the big to the smaller towns, and finally to the villages. By this means the Commonwealth will be advertised in the remotest corners. In the course of time Australia will be brought before the public simultaneously in thousands of different centers."

Free Pictures for Schools.

In a final word on the educational advantages of the bioscope, Mr. Sutto said there had just been established in France an association, presided over by the Minister of Education, which has for its object the giving of free shows in all the populous schools. These are attended by the children of poor people, who are unable to pay taxes, and therefore could not take their offspring to see the pictures when a charge is made for admission. By this means it is hoped to disseminate useful knowledge through the greatest of all teaching factors—personal observation.

GROWTH AND SCOPE OF MOVING PICTURES.

Writing in the American Exporter, Horace Baker makes note of the fact the moving picture business is extending from amusement enterprises to commercial fields. A large shoe concern recently had a series of pictures taken of its processes of manufacture, of which the company made a special exhibit in various town. There was a perceptible increase in their business in every town where the pictures were exhibited. Mr. Baker thinks that there is a future in this direction in the way of advertising. He goes on:

"Another instance of the entrance of the moving picture into the commercial world is connected with the recent installation of glass-blowing machines in some of the large glass works in the Central West. At the time of the formation of the company for the manufacture of these machines endeavors were made to get foreign capital interested in the project. Bankers abroad sent their representatives over here to see the machines, but when they returned home their employers absolutely refused to believe there was any such machine that could blow glass automatically. Sending the machine abroad was virtually out of the question; it was cumbrous and liable to be broken, and while the promoters of the company were confident that their machine was good, they lacked the means of convincing the foreign investors that the machine was of real commercial value.

"It was decided, therefore, to have a complete series of moving pictures taken, showing the modus operandi of the machine, and send them abroad. These were reproduced in foreign countries where they would have the desired effect, and the result was the immediate acquisition of foreign capital for the promotion of the company.

"Formerly the manufacturer of moving pictures was obliged to content himself with an actual event, such as a train in motion, a street scene, parade, or something of that character. At the present day, however, it is entirely different. The work of the moving picture maker falls into two classes —actual events and acted imitations of events.

"The actual events are usually only partly real, that is, In the case of army manoeuvers, for instance, specially timed evolutions are given at the close for the benefit of the artist. On one occasion a moving picture man was given a position on a warship and allowed virtually to command a whole fleet, for a brief period, having ingeniously, but none the less truly, pointed out to the admiral that a picture of fleet evolutions exhibited in the inland States would be a powerful aid to the naval recruiting officer..

"A statistician says that the moving picture shows in this country drew a daily attendance of 4,000,000 during 1908, or more than 1,000,000,000 during the year. Over $50,000,000 is invested in the industry, and 199 miles of films are shown every day."

McMILLAN, OF CHICAGO, IN EUROPE.

According to The Kinematograph (London): "Mr. A. McMillan, the representative of the Exclusive Film Company, of Chicago, has been in London on a mission which should make him an object of considerable interest to British manufacturers. Mr. McMillan's object is to buy as much film of good quality as he can lay hands on in Europe. His only conditions are that the subjects should be good and that they should not have been previously sent to America—his company's specialty, as its name indicates, being the hiring of films which cannot be obtained elsewhere. Of such subjects Mr. McMillan can take five or six copies. He has already despatched close on £3,000 worth of goods, and is anxious to hear from firms who have more to offer before leaving for a trip through Germany, France and Italy in search of films. He is authorized to buy $15,000 worth of goods each month if the subjects can be found.

Mr. McMillan said that the intention of his company, which was only formed in June last and is backed by many of the leading business men of Chicago, to open five or six rental offices, or alternatively to sell surplus copies of the films, and he emphasized the fact that they were not in any way working against the International Projecting and Purchasing Company, which represents many of the European firms. Mr. McMillan will not accept subjects which have been or going to be submitted to Mr. J. J. Murdock, although he pointed out that he could on several occasions by buying, say, five copies of a certain subject, get it on the market before the International Company and so spoil the latter's sale, which might perhaps have reached thirty copies.

"In Mr. McMillan's opinion, the Independents are rapidly gaining ground in the States, and there would be a good demand for English subjects if the makers would cater for the American taste. Mr. McMillan pointed to the springing up of new manufacturing concerns as evidence of the vitality of the moment and paid a tribute to Mr. J. J. Murdock, whom he described as the Napoleon of the film business in the States."

"HALLBERG" ECONOMIZER FOR AIRDOMES.

Proprietors and managers of open air moving picture theaters are beginning to find out that it requires a powerful current at the arc for moving picture lamps to be operated outdoors, especially in the city where a certain amount of street lighting and other illumination interferes with the light on the screen. On account of the great current strength at the arc with the "Hallberg" economizer, Mr. Hallberg has secured orders for several economizers to be used in airdomes, among which may be mentioned the following: Jos. Koster, southeast corner 138th street and Southern boulevard, Bronx; Wahn & Harley Airdome, 145th street and Lenox avenue; Jos. Boyance, 142d street and Edgecombe avenue; Geo. Nelligan, 14th street and St. Ann's avenue, Bronx, and Bronx Oval, Southern boulevard and 163d street.

THE "BURNS-JOHNSON FIGHT" FILM IN INDIA.

How the Local Baboo Showman Advertises It.

Readers of The Moving Picture World will be interested and amused at the quaint wording of the circular in which an Indian showman advertises the film on which the Burns-Johnson fight is shown:

Some years ago when we first exhibited living pictures in the Stage of Star Theater by Bioscope, at that time we saw the men were running and swimming, the horses in pictures were galloping, the train was running fast, the water in the picture was waving and the ships in the water were floating or clearing the foams, which made us very much astonishing.

But now the Bioscope has arisen in another style. It is now exhibited as a charmed something. The enlightened Europeans, worldly scenery, national glory, and historical incidents, trying to print in the hearts of young men as for pleasing example of learnings will soon establish the Bioscope in Schools.

We arrange for a night or two to please the audience by showing the learned scenery if a new kind of sceneful Bioscope appears at Calcutta.

What the picture is?
Johnson and Burns Fight or Boxing between Black and White.
The scenery is very strange!
The White is away by attack of Black!!
By and by here and there.

The public belief is that America is a very happy country; there is no distinction between rich and poor. The influence of Democracy is very great, indeed it is very great among them; and when the White and Black were boxing each other then the brotherly terms treat as an enmity between them. Why this comes? The thing is that Mr. Tom Burns is the Inhabitant of America. He was a champion Boxer, very good man, much influence over tenants (?) In the meantime one man named Johnson (Johnson, but not real Johnson) deep black, an Un European dam nigger (!) came there and asking for a fight.

Burns was very much astonished thinking "Is he mad? If the man bites then there will be Hydrophobia as the mad dog bites. Go away black Johnson it is shame for me to fight with you." He now says in his mind "If I be defeated with this Black Johnson then the whole world will laugh at me and then it would be better for me to die at the very spot than to live." But Johnson did not leave him and began to press him attack after attack it is rumored throughout. Then Mr. Burns secretly left America for England in a sacred day. The Americans can sacrify their lives for the White Europeans (?) But Johnson did not leave Burns, he bought one ticket and started for England to fight with Mr. Burns. Johnson says "Here is no distinction between color and creed. You better prepare for fighting with me." Burns was in the habit of saying not to-day but to-morrow, not here but there, in such a manner he passed many days and afterwards totall absconded. Johnson by searching found that my uncle is in Australia. Crocodile Johnson having heard that his elephant-like uncle is in Australia, went there and asking for fight. This time Burns says if you can give me six thousand pounds or ninety thousand Rupees to lose win or draw. Johnson hearing the money matters fell down like a Hysteria patient. It is a matter of one lakhs of Rupees who will bear this? "God speaks with bakshimi, have you ever heard the repentance of Black, you had better remove the distress of my black son. Mother went to Australia with a Raik or Bag before the sleeping man Mackintosh. Mackintosh dreamt that dozen after dozen Bank notes, heap of sovereigns or Mohurs and thousand and thousand men running here and there. The telegram comes from Europe to America, the tickets are purchasing black and white boxing, there was a heap of gold in his face."

The next day McIntosh arose from sleep. Said Johnson, "I shall pay you the whole money as required for fighting." The heart of uncle Burns was burnt, he says in his mind "If I die in a blow here better to go in heaven."

THE FIGHT BETWEEN BLACK AND WHITE.

A large ground was arranged, the workers working day and night with electric lights; within a moment the tickets sold ten thousand pounds.

The front seats being £10 10s. and the gallery £3 3s. The total tickets sold £26,500. He will make money in multiplication. McIntosh on selling tickets was a man of £1,000,000.

This occurrence will be shown by separate Photo which aggregates 41 in all. The seas and Bays of Australia, the scenery of beautiful forest, the war between elephant and crocodile, Burns swimming, the rush at ticket rooms, the flood audience, 20,400 in a playground, many sorts of boxing, down in the fight. (Johnson conquered.) Burns fell

Come, we have no need of freight for Australia, we have no need to suffer in sea-sickness ,we have no need of salt-flesh in Steamer, and also to see here in home you will fulfil your desire this Johnson and Burns fight in Star Theater!

Comments on the Week's Films.

THE PRINCE AND THE PAUPER (Edison Mfg. Co.)

Perhaps the best work the Edison Company has ever done was shown this week in "The Prince and the Pauper," a beautiful adaptation of Mark Twain's well known story. The dual role was assumed by Miss Cecil Spooner especially for this production and it is needless to say that little was left to be done to make the dramatic quality perfect. Indeed, one can scarcely offer a criticism of any kind. The whole picture, including its photographic and tonal qualities, seems to be unusually good, rivalling most of the foreign work in this respect and far surpassing practically all that the same firm has offered heretofore. The title was especially posed by Mr. Clemens and shows that the picture was made with his full consent. To undertake to criticise a film of this character is not an easy task. The illustration of the story, or the pictured story, as it might be called, follows the text of the original as closely as possible. Of course it is never possible to make the story complete, but in this instance the scenes have been selected with more than usual fidelity to the spirit of the original and everyone who has read the story will be even more interested to read it again now that it has been seen actually moving upon the screen. From the scene where the prince takes the pauper into the palace and changes clothes with him there is not a moment that the thread of the story is lost, nor is there a scene which is in any degree obscure. The real prince, even in his pauper rags, is always the prince, while the few glimpses of the pauper, even though in the palace, surrounded by courtiers and clothed in ermine and purple, is still the pauper. Their origin cannot be disguised by what they wear. Perhaps this truthful interpretation is the best feature of the dramatic work. The designation by action is never so easy as designation by dress, and to carry this successfully through several scenes is an achievement of importance and one which may well be considered carefully by motion picture players. Perhaps in work of this sort lies the germ of all successful motion picture making. If it is possible to make characters speak, or show their real selves by action alone in one drama, it can surely be done in others, and that, after all, is the essential feature of motion pictures. Actions must speak. The word is not there to make explanations for weakness or failure of any kind. In speaking of the technical qualities of the film one must needs be liberal in praise. The staging has been done with a liberality which adds immensely to the richness and attractiveness of the picture and which makes it possible to realize the difference between the environment of a prince and a pauper. The changes in the toning of the film, from a warm brown to a cold blue, where the spirit of the picture seems to warrant it, is a pleasing relief from monotony, pleasing because it is well done, not because it is a change in color alone. The photographer did his work well. The development of the film must have been carefully done to retain the soft graduations of tone which add materially to the pictorial effect, and the printer took full advantage of all the opportunities that had been given him. The result is a picture which is rounded and complete and deserves something besides a run of a day and then relegation to the scrap heap before one-fourth of the theatergoers have seen it and before many have had the opportunity.

"The Bugle Call."—A Vitagraph war drama which has some stirring scenes and is technically good throughout. One feels strangely stirred as the girl gives her lover his charge, as his regiment leaves for the front, to be true to his flag, his bugle and to her. And it seems strange that he should later become so near a deserter afterward; yet he is saved by a vision of his sweetheart as she looked when she gave him the charge and he plunges into the fight, saving the colors, but receiving a severe wound in doing it. And she, like the true hearted woman who risked quite as much as the men in the war for the Union, hurries to the front to care for him when she learns that he has been wounded. And she is present when he is commended for his bravery by the commanding general. All this seems simple enough in the telling, but it arouses the spirit of patriotism and loyalty and causes one's blood to course faster when seeing the fighting and in imagination listening to the ringing notes of the bugle. Technically the picture is good, only here and there does it appear as though the negative was under exposed. Dramatically the interest is centered in the reproduction of war scenes.

"The Truant."—A comedy from the Vitagraph studio which tells a story of a boy who was soundly thrashed for truancy and turned the tables on his father by setting back the clocks so he arrived at the office late and was discharged, according to the rule posted by his concern. But when the boss heard of the affair he laughed at the joke and reinstated the employee. There is a good deal of boy life in the picture which is faithfully interpreted, and the technical quality is satisfactory. It is less silly than some of the alleged comics and received applause where the writer saw it.

"The Morning After."—A Gaumont comedy which graphically illustrates the difficulties of a man "the morning after" who sought many doctors to cure him of his dry mouth and his headache, only to be turned away on one pretext or another. At last a veterinary surgeon offers him a glass of water and he departs completely cured. The absurdity of the combinations in the offices of the different specialists furnishes the sport in this, and the technical quality is such that it is a pleasure to look at it.

"The Turning Point."—An Urban which delivers a telling temperance lecture and the story, as told in the film, should cause one who had begun the downward way to foresake it. The photography is good, and the conception of having the victim of a few glasses see his future in a vision is impressive, causing one to feel that the moral influence of a film of this type is well worth considering. The pictorial effect is good, as it always is in the Urban films.

"Stripping a Forest in Winter."—An Urban, the negatives for which were made in the great pine forests of the Northwest where a business is made of lumbering. There is instruction, entertainment and excitement in about equal proportions in this picture. Technically it would be difficult to improve it and it will add much to the interest of a programme.

"The Factory Girl."—A Kalem drama which is set in a new field for that company. Hitherto they have been operating with a Southern background, but in this drama they have gone to New England and have taken life in a New England factory town as the basis of their new play. It is a story of evil passion, scheming ambition, innocent love, with a triumph for the innocent and pure love. There are exciting scenes of attempted attention on the part of a foreman of the mill, which is repulsed by the girl, then enters a scheming niece who wants the son of the mill owner for her husband and together they work up a plot to have the mill girl, whom the son loves, accused of robbery. It all works well until the time of the arrest, and then the denouement brings the plotters to justice and gives Mabel to Ned, with the full consent of Ned's father. The dramatic possibilities are fully developed and the play holds the breathless interest of the audience from the beginning to the happy ending. There is no death scene to shroud it in gloom and the leading away of the culprits seems the right thing to do, hence one rises from seeing this picture with a greater degree of satisfaction because it has no gloomy suggestion to make one wish one had not seen it. The Kalem dramas are alive. That much has been proved many times, and while the photographic quality is not always up to the highest standard, the plays themselves are frequently good enough to compensate for any loss in this respect.

"A Mother's Sorrow."—A Pathe picture which has the same shroud of gloom that seems to afflict so many that come from abroad. Perhaps some sons are as unnatural as the one here illustrated, but they are not numerous, and why an episode like this, with the ruin of a mother, the pursuit of an adventuress by the son, with the death of the mother in the repentant son's arms should be made into a picture, it is difficult to say. There is nothing attractive in it, except the photographic quality, which, like all Pathe films, is excellent, and one ceases looking at it rather than follow it to the close. Such films are not amusing. They are not even mildly instructive and, in the opinion of the writer, have small place on the screen of a theater where people go to be amused.

"Charity Begins at Home."—A rather amusing picture from the Pathes which shows how a young man who was cut off by his uncle because he was a spendthrift turns the tables and induces the old gentleman to tear up one will and make another in his own favor after filling his uncle's house with a mob of poor and needy, to whom the money had been left. The sudden change of heart of the uncle is a bit of comedy which is certain to please and the film is free from the objectionable gloom which mars so many.

"A Strange Meeting."—The Biograph people have produced a film under this title which should be widely circulated, and if it is, unquestionably its influence will be strongly felt by all religious organizations. It lost some of its force when the writer saw it because it followed the "Salvation Army Lass," by the same company, which is also religious. The two, in fact, preach powerful sermons, much too powerful to be attractive when presented one after the other. The management of the theater which does things of this sort detracts from the attractiveness of his show and destroys a portion, at least, of the excellence of both films. Either one shown alone would have been good. The two together rather palled on the taste and one was disposed to wish that one or the other had been replaced with something else. The work of the slum missions is well illustrated in this latest film. And it does not detract from the picture's peculiar attractions to see the minister of the slums go down into a dance hall and help a mother take her boy away. When he knocks down one bully and threatens all the others with an upraised pitcher, a murmur of applause goes around the room. The day of muscular Christianity has not yet passed. The acting of the young woman who is finally saved is especially good, and the return of the stolen watch, with her subsequent flight, is an excellent bit of work. The burglary is well planned and the minister's action in allowing the thieves to go is quite in keeping with the character he has assumed. The final conversion of the young woman is satisfactory and supplies the necessary dramatic ending which balances up the rest of the play and makes it appear real. It is impossible to offer any criticism. The Biograph people work out their scenarios so perfectly before they produce the picture that their films are as nearly perfect as it is possible to make them. This picture should be one of the most popular the company has ever brought out; and it is safe to say that if more such films were sent out there would be less criticism and less fault found with the motion picture theater in general.

"The Little Orphan."—A drama from the Vitagraph studio which has interesting elements and leaves no bad impression, because it ends happily. It tells the story of a little girl who is abused by a new aunt and who finally wanders away in an attempt to reach Rome, meets a young artist whose heart warms to her because he has lost his own wife and child, and it ends with she and her adopted parent at last at Rome. The subject gives little opportunity for dramatic development, nor does it permit of any especially strong acting, but it tells a story which appeals to the heart, and because it does so, is interesting and brings tears to many eyes. Such tender stories as this are useful as well as interesting, and in this the Vitagraph people have produced one which will appeal to any audience, no matter where the picture may be shown.

"The Parks of Berlin."—An Eclipse film which illustrates the parks of Berlin in an entertaining manner. Some of the photography is not up to the Eclipse standard, but aside from this minor defect the pictures are good and afford a fair idea of the appearance of the parks of that city and the crowds which frequent them.

"Thellys' Heart."—A Pathe, the scenario of which is laid in ancient Rome. The film is technically perfect and is beautifully colored, which adds immensely to its attractiveness. It concerns a Roman love story and reaches its greatest interest when Thellys is torn from her lover's arms and given to another who has more money, the principal point of attraction for her father. But she refuses her new lover's advances and finally he gambles her away to his former sweetheart disguised as a man. To get the objectionable girl out of the way this woman sends her to the woods, where she is tied to a tree, and left to her fate. The acting through this portion of the film is good, evidencing much care in studying the ways of those who are about to be executed in this inhuman manner. While fastened to the tree she is discovered by her former lover, and they go away together, happy in each other's love. It is a simple story, yet has sufficient heart interest to hold the attention of the audience throughout the length of the film.

"Much Ado About Nothing."—The Essanay Company has produced a film which has many interesting and truly funny situations under the above title. It is a story of exchanged overcoats in which the men carried the pictures of their wives and the disturbances raised in both homes when the wives discover another woman's portrait in the pockets where their own should be are sufficient to cause men to give a second thought to the possibility. The women finally decide to start out looking for each other, and when they meet there is more difficulty, which is settled by a policeman taking them both in. The husbands are sent for and the accidental exchange is discovered. Explanations follow and everybody is happy. The film is livey, full of comical situations, and never fails to raise a laugh.

"The Mustard Plaster."—An Essanay picture which graphically illustrates the possibilities for disturbance which reside in a mustard plaster. The difficulties of the man who has two on at the same time furnish fun for the length of the picture. What he does to escape from the burning constitutes a funny combination, ending at last in a cold storage warehouse, where he is freezing to death without obtaining relief. But when the offending plasters are finally taken off he vows that some other method of curing a cold will be adopted in the future.

"Before the Mast" (Selig).—A drama which smells of the sea and illustrates a particularly malignant attack of jealousy, which led to shanghaiing the hero and his abuse on board ship. The dramatic interest in the story is maintained throughout by a succession of thrilling scenes, reaching a climax when the hero receives a severe lashing upon the bare back and in desperation knocks down half a dozen men and jumps overboard into the sea. He is picked up by a passing fishing smack and arrives at home just in time to prevent his rival and persecutor from again making love to his wife. The picture reaches its highest development of dramatic art when the hypocrite is confronted by the man he has abused and wronged and apparently killed, and slinks away with his face covered, shutting out the sight of the man he supposed dead. The picture is melodramatic, but none the less interesting, and holds the closest attention of the audience throughout. Photographically it is better than many from the same studio, evidencing more care in that department and showing conclusively that the photographic work is improving.

"His Little Girl."—A Lubin which has a fund of delicate humor, as most of the Lubin comedies have, and give a graphic illustration of the chagrin of a man who has been asked to care for a friend's little girl, only to discover that she is a big girl. Within three months he has decided that he will continue to care for her and within a year another little girl which belongs to both. The picture is good and is interesting because of the incongruous situation developed at the beginning. The rest is not above commonplace.

"She Would Be an Actress."—The story of a wife who determined to be an actress, as told by the Lubin players. The husband objects and through his objections many lively incidents occur. Finally he declares he will secure a divorce if she doesn't give up her useless infatuation, and the picture ends with husband and wife reunited.

"The Mended Lute."—A Biograph which tells a tale of Indian love and romance, laid in the region about Spirit Lake, Iowa. It is the familiar love story, where the lover accepted by the Indian girl is objectionable to her father, and despite her protests she is given to someone else. The lovers manage to get together, however, and escape, but are captured and condemned to death. When tortured the brave exhibits such fortitude that he wins the admiration of his captor, who frees him and sends them away together. This is the story, but the working out of the details, which are believed to be true in every particuar to Indian life as it was known among the Sioux at that time, will command attention wherever the picture is shown. For one thing, it illustrates an entirely new feature of that life. It is generally supposed that the Sioux is without sentiment of any kind, but to see here blended so much poetry and romance, and to see them both based upon what appear to be actual facts, is a view of Indian character which will be interesting, because new. And the technical quality of the work is beyond criticism, as the Biograph work is understood to be, while the acting is up to the high standard which those players have set. One wants to see this picture more than once because it seems convincing and develops such a new and interesting phase of Sioux character. The canoe race also is exciting and skillfully handled, a subject in itself.

New Albany, Ind.—City Clerk John F. Short has purchased the moving picture show business in the Fleicher business block, on Vincennes street.

The Imported Film and Supply Company (Limited), of New Orleans, has been incorporated. Capital stock, $5,000. The officers of the company are J. E. Pearce, president; F. W. Pearce, secretary-treasurer. Directors, Josiah Pearce, Fred W. Pearce, J. Eugene Pearce.

The Premo Company, of Philadelphia, have sent us for inspection a set of their slides for "Singing Bird," a captivating Indian melody and love song published by the Jos. Morris Co., of Philadelphia. The slides are just a bit out of the ordinary. The characters are posed in full Indian chief costume and the gaily colored trappings are reproduced in the slides with remarkable fidelity. The scenes are well selected and photographed and the slides have been colored with some degree of artistic taste. Altogether the set and the song should be in great demand by the exchanges, as they are just the kind that have proved to be specially in favor with moving picture audiences.

THE PITTSBURG CALCIUM LIGHT AND FILM COMPANY DESIRE CO-OPERATION OF PENNSYLVANIA EXHIBITORS IN THEIR EFFORTS TO MODIFY THE LAW.

Pittsburg, Pa., August 5, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Thinking perhaps that your paper may be interested in knowing what we have done toward obtaining an injunction against the Pennsylvania Factory Inspector to prevent him from enforcing the recent law passed by the Pennsylvania Legislature requiring each moving picture theater to have three aisles four feet wide, we enclose you herewith copies of the various correspondence which we have sent out to the exhibitors in the State of Pennsylvania in an effort to have them all join with us in this action.

These letters speak for themselves and explain what we have done so far in the way of trying to get the exhibitors lined up for united action against the Pennsylvania three-aisle law. Notwithstanding all this correspondence, and the fact that the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company alone employed four of the best attorneys in this State, and that this concern alone is responsible for the payment of their fees, which we assure you are quite high, we have been unable to get a number of the exhibitors to even answer any of these letters, and with all our efforts up to date, we have succeeded in getting seventy-nine exhibitors in this State to answer the questions asked in letter No. 3.

Our attorneys advised us that it would be impossible for us to proceed with this action and include all names that we had on our list, but that it was necessary that each one individually answered the questions asked in letter No. 3, and sign the same signifying their willingness that we should conduct this litigation on their behalf.

We feel as though our letters have explained the matter to them thoroughly, but for some unaccountable reason they do not seem to realize what this law would mean if strictly enforced. The Factory Inspector of this State is determined to enforce the law and our attorneys advised us yesterday not to wait any longer. We, therefore, turned over to them yesterday the names of seventy-nine theaters who have expressed their willingness that we should go ahead and advised our attorneys to proceed, and the injunction suit will be filed either to-day or to-morrow in Harrisburg, Pa.

We have given this matter a great deal of time and attention and have spent quite a lot of money and are obligated to stand quite a great deal more, and the attitude of the Pennsylvania exhibitors is certainly a puzzle to us.

You will note that we have agreed to include their names at absolutely no cost to them, but, notwithstanding this, we have been unable to get them to even reply to our letters. Our requests for financial assistance in this matter have certainly met with a frost. Out of the first five hundred letters sent we received contributions to the amount of $57.00. This fact, however, has had no effect upon our position in this matter, and we are going ahead entirely upon our own responsibility. Our request to the other exchanges in this State for financial assistance was not productive of any results. Mr. Rowland, president of this company, personally made a trip to Philadelphia and tried to have the Philadelphia exchanges join with us in this action, but they held aloof.

Our attorneys have informed us that the law regulating the construction of the moving picture booth cannot be set aside, and we ourselves believe this law is a good thing for the business. Our attorneys feel satisfied, however, that the law requiring three four-foot aisles is unconstitutional.

We would like very much to have your paper give this matter some attention, and urge upon the exhibitors of this State the necessity of some action. It is hard for us to account for their apparent indifference, when it is a known fact that not ten per cent. of the exhibitors outside of the cities of Pittsburg and Philadelphia can comply with this law.

We hope your paper will urge them to action and help us waken them up to the seriousness of the situation, which we have up to date been unable to do.

Yours truly,

PITTSBURGH CALCIUM LIGHT & FILM CO.
James B. Clark, Sec. and Treas.

THE FOLLOWING LETTERS HAVE BEEN SENT TO THE EXHIBTORS:

June 25, 1909.

Gentlemen: We desire your assistance in the raising of a fund to employ several lawyers to secure the proper interpretation of the law recently passed by the Pennsylvania Legislature, which requires all moving picture shows to have three four-foot aisles in the clear.

The Factory Inspector at Harrisburg has interpreted this law as covering all moving picture shows. We feel that the proper interpretation of this law is that it applies to theaters having one or more galleries, instead of moving picture shows.

We have employed several able attorneys whose opinion is that there is a flaw in Section Second of Act No. 233, and that the proper interpretation of the law covers houses in which there are one or more galleries. The employment of these attorneys will take considerable money and we do not feel we ought to bear all of the expenses. We feel that every exhibitor in the State who will be affected by this law should be very willing to contribute towards a fund for the employment of these attorneys, and that it will take at least $10.00 from each exhibitor in this State to cover a portion of the necessary expense, and the balance of the expense we feel should be paid by the film rental exchanges.

If you feel as though you could help us out in this matter we would be pleased to have you forward your contribution to the fund in the enclosed envelope.

If the Factory Inspector has not already visited your theater and ordered you to comply with the law or close up, he probably will reach you in a very short time. This is a very serious matter and must be attended to promptly.

We would therefore ask you to let us hear from you by return mail.

Yours truly,
PITTSBURGH CALCIUM LIGHT & FILM CO.

P. S.—Any money not expended will be returned proportionately to those who contributed.

Dear Sir: Four of the best attorneys in Pennsylvania have been employed by us to test the law recently passed by the Pennsylvania Legislature which compels every moving picture theater to have three four-foot aisles.

Our attorneys advise that they will enumerate in our bill in equity only the names of those who will join with us and help pay the expense of this action, and that the filing of this bill will prevent any immediate action by the Factory Inspector against persons named by our attorneys in this bill, but will not prevent the Factory Inspector from proceeding against any persons or concerns not named in the bill. If you wish to have your name included in this action, please forward to our office at once $10.00 and we will see that you are included in this action.

The papers are now being prepared and will be filed not later than Thursday, July 15th, so if you wish your name included in this action, we must have your remittance by that date. If this law affects your theater, would advise that you act quickly, as it may be the means of saving your business. Only those who contribute will be taken care of if this action is successful.

Please let us hear from you immediately regarding this matter.

Yours truly,
PITTSBURGH CALCIUM LIGHT & FILM CO.

July 23, 1909.

Dear Sir: As you are already probably aware, the Legislature of this State of 1909 passed an act containing such drastic provisions with respect to the arrangement of building used by the persons engaged in the theater and moving picture business, that if said act shall be enforced it will probably force many persons engaged in the business named to retire.

At the request of many of our customers we have determined to unite with them in contesting the validity of this legislation and have employed counsel to whom the conduct of the litigation will be submitted, their instruction being to endeavor to secure from the courts a final decision that the legislation is invalid.

We have reason to believe that the law is unconstitutional and that a preliminary injunction can undoubtedly be obtained in favor of those who unite in this litigation, which will prevent the application of the law to them until the question shall be finally determined. Those uniting in this litigation will have the benefit of the expected suspension of the law until the question shall be fully tested and finally decided. Those who do not unite in this litigation are liable to be closed by the action of the Factory Inspector at any time without warning. August 2, 1909.

Dear Sir: On July 23rd we wrote you a letter, a duplicate of which we enclose you herewith. In this letter we asked you to fill in the answers to the various questions, sign the same and return to us, and your theater would be included in our action to test the new Pennsylvania three-aisle law.

Up to the present time we have not heard from you regarding this and wish to state that it is very hard for us to understand the attitude of a large number of the Pennsylvania moving picture exhibitors.

We have started action against this law at a very heavy expense to ourselves and have offered to include you in the same at absolutely no cost to you whatever, but still you do not give us an opportunity to include your name, as it is absolutely necessary that these blanks be filled up before the attorneys can include your theater.

We wish to state that we have gone to a great deal of trouble and expense trying to test this law for the benefit of the exhibitors in Pennsylvania, but if they will not fill in the answers to the questions on the enclosed letter, we are absolutely powerless to include them in this action.

We wish to state that the exhibitors in this State do not seem to appreciate what we are doing for them in this matter. We feel that you should hurry your answer in, as it will cost you nothing whatever and will be the means of saving your theater if you do not have room to put in three four-foot aisles.

Yours truly,

PITTSBURGH CALCIUM LIGHT & FILM CO.

[Adversity, as a rule, unites those who are in danger and makes them combine to face the difficulty. In this case the Pennsylvania exhibitors and exchanges who have not collaborated with the praiseworthy efforts of the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company, merit our commiseration for their lukewarm nature. The Factory Inspector says he will strictly enforce the law until it is declared unconstitutional. It requires signatures and data and money to do this. If the work started by the Pittsburg Film Company meets with proper co-operation, it can be done. Rally all together.—Ed. M. P. W.]

Little Falls, Minn.—C. L. Nelson, of Anoka, has leased the Germania Opera House here and will start a moving picture theater there.

Yankton, S. D.—A. A. Lind, of Sioux City, and J. M. Cunningham, of this city, have sold the Scenic Theater here to Ed. H. Lower and son, Ernest, of Sioux City.

Charles City, Ia.—B. F. Anderson has purchased the Dewey Moving Picture Theater in the Fitzgerald Building and is now ready for business.

Buffalo, N. Y.—Claude Fowler, 1213 Jefferson street, and Frederick Ullma are receiving bids for the erection of a moving picture theater, to be located at 264 Genesee street.

Logansport, Ind.—J. C. Shaver, of Monticello, has purchased the Lyric Moving Picture Theater here and has taken possession.

Sandusky, Ohio.—Mr. Carl Bitzer, manager of the Royal Theater, Sandusky, Ohio, will spend a two weeks' vacation touring Ohio and Indiana with Mr. Krapp, of this city, visiting friends on the way. The Royal Theater has been a great success under Mr. Bitzer's management. During Mr. Bitzer's vacation Miss Holda Hochendel, of Ann Arbor, Mich., will sing the illustrated songs.

Charles Town, W. Va.—The Rex, E. G. Henson, manager, reports good business. They now have one of the coziest little theaters in the South, playing nightly to crowded houses. Their programme consists of only the very best pictures and high class vaudeville. Free ice water is served by uniformed attendants; an orchestra of six pieces furnishes the music for this house. The people on the streets still say to each other, "How can they do it for 5 cents?" And the answer is always the same, "Because they know how."

Next Issue, Friday, August 13th

SHELTERED UNDER STARS AND STRIPES

Dramatic Approx. Length 450

Woman's Wit Is Ever Keen.—This Bison production shows how Bessie, daughter of General McLennon, saves her lover from the Union soldiers by sheltering him under the folds of the American flag. This subject is an extremely beautiful work of photographic and dramatic art.

YIDDISHER COWBOY

Comedy Approx. Length 550

The opening scene of this amusing comedy shows peddling Lexy seated beneath a huge poster of a cowboy. He succumbs to Morpheus, the God of Sleep, and is soon imagining he is the living counterpart of the poster. His adventures are a series of the funniest incidents ever chronicled in motion pictures and the film as a whole in the race of laugh producers is the one best bet.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE BETTER WAY.—A beautiful story of Puritan days. No period of time was more poetic and afforded material for romance than the days of the Puritans. Quaint in manners, honest in character and picturesque in costume, they have furnished more inspiration to writers and artists than any other people. Their lives were one long line of tranquillity, which seemed the personification of a poem. Appreciating this, the Biograph Company has in this production succeeded in portraying an episode of that period with all the tender decisiveness essential to typical perfection. Elizabeth Parker is wooed by young Oliver Sylvester, who is loved by her in return. Her all-absorbing dream is of the day when she will become the happy bride of Oliver. Fortune, however, is unkind to her family and dire straits force her to barkeu to the proposal of Old Squire Calvin Cartwright, an honest, tender-natured farmer of considerable means. Marriage with the Squire would assure Elizabeth of her widowed mother's comfort, hence she consents and is married. Oliver does not seem to realize the truth of the conditions and persistently seeks the poor girl, with a view of alluring her from her aged husband. What a terrible position for the girl, who really loves the fellow and so has not the power to repulse him firmly, her romantic dreams rising, almost taunting, in her mind. While Oliver is pleading earnestly, the Squire enters and fully appreciating her plight, makes the sacrifice, bidding her go with her heart's desire, as he feels he is too old to make her happy and forget. Elizabeth is astounded, and under the influence of her young lover, whom she deludedly believes the soul of honor, accepts the proposed surrender, and leaves with Oliver. They have not gone far when se seizes the weak, trembling girl in his arms and passiouately kisses her. That kiss is the awakening. She is aroused from her lethargy and is now fully alive to her sense of duty. Casting her lover aside, she dashes madly to her mother's home, not daring to re-enter that of her husband. The Squire, however, altbough he seemed impassive at the time, sank into despondency when she was gone, aud would have died from grief, had not Elizabeth been persuaded to return to him she had now learned to love. Length, 990 feet.

THEY WOULD ELOPE.—Love has ever laughed at locksmiths, but on this particular occasion the laugh is on Cupid, for that chubby archer certainly miscalculated in arranging the programme of the romance of Harry and Bessie. Still the episode will he looked upon in after days as a decidedly streuuous page iu their life's history, and one need not he possessed of an excessively keen sense of humor to appreciate its comedy value. Harry and Bessie loved each other with all the impetuosity of youth and during one of the many occasions when they pledge undying affection, are surprised by Papa, who, in the spirit of jest, pretends to be highly enranged at their presumption, apparently treating them as mere kids. Papa out of the way, they resent heing treated as children and plan to elope. Leaving a note to this effect, they decamp, and engaged the services of a horse and carriage which appears to he an 1850 model, to put them beyond appreheusion until the knot is tied, but the pursuers cometh not. They havn't gone far when the vehicle breaks down, and in a panic they scamper along the road until they meet an automobile, and as all the world loves a lover, they easily enlist the chauffeur's aid—but the pursuers cometh not. Everything is going fine, and they are hitting only the high places in the road when—Bang!-s-s-s-l-l—meaning something's "busted"—auto out of business. Again they are forced to skedaddle until poor little Bessie drops exhausted. Harry secures a wheelharrow and does the strong man act, and pushes the precious freight to the lakeside where they jump into a canoe and are soon skimming the placid aqua—yet the pursuers cometh not. Smoothly and swiftly they glide until over goes the craft, and the cool water has a chilling effect on Bessie, who, struggling to the bank, refuses to go any further, hut turns homeward. Furthermore, what's the use of eloping when you're not pursued. Here's the reason: When Papa read the note, he at once gets everyhody husy at preparing a feast and decorating the place in manner fitting their return as hride and groom. It is in upon this scene of gayety they hurst bedraggled, wet and muddy, to inform the folks that despite the adventure they are still unmarried. However, Rev. Mr. Wiffles is present and does the decd, so the feast is not wasted. Length, 572 feet.

JONES' BURGLAR.—Everything on this old mundane sphere has its use. Even the hurglar's visit, strange as it may seem, may prove a hlessing, as this Biograph comedy will verify. Jones has an insatiahle longing to go to the club for a little game, so as a subterfuge tells his wife he is called out on husiness. Mrs. J. hy this time has become cruelly incredulous and declares she will wait up for him. At the club Jonesy breaks the hank, things come his way, hut when he leaves for bome he anticipates that on his return things may continue to come, hut not so felicitously. However, luck is still with him, for he finds a hurglar trying to gain entrance into his home. Aha! an Idea. The hurglar is a coward, and he forces him to break in and so plays the hero, thereby softening his wife's anger hy apparently apprehending bim. Length, 388 feet.

THE UNEXPECTED GUEST.—Young Dr. Fletcher is in love with Alice Chalmers, a young nurse of much refinement who througb unfortunate circumstauces has heen obliged to earn her own living. They love not wisely hut too well. Dr. Fletcher writes to his father asking his consent for his marriage with the young nurse. The father, however, has higher plans with his son and at once comes to visit him. He refuses to give his consent and visits the youug lady. After a stormy interview she writes to her lover as follows:

"My Dear Robert:—

Your father has just told me of his plans for your future, also that marriage with a girl of wealth and social position can alone assure your rapid advancement. Hence, in view of your father's objection to our marriage, I leave you free to act as you may judge best. HELEN.

P. S. However I must see you again as there is something you should know and which may affect your decision. H."

The father takes the letter, tears off the postscript and tells his son that his sweetheart has given him up.

Two years have passed. Miss Chalmers lies in the hospital on her death hed, in her arms the little child, the son of the young doctor. She promises Alice to take care of the little waif. A last pressure of the hand and the poor girl dies.

The wedding guests are assembled, the groom is waiting with a bappy smile for his intended, hut she is nowhere to he found. The door is thrown open, the young lady enters, throws open her coat aud shows the little hahy to his father. Consternation all around. The young doctor is horror stricken. He sees the duplicity of his father who vainly tries to excuse his act. The guests are dismissed. The doctor takes his hahy to care for it in the future. The hride recognizing that her intended was only misguided, offers to share with him the cares of the little one. Length, 890 feet.

THE LEOPARD QUEEN.—A story, unique as to pictures, founded on fact and produced with absolute fiedelity to nature. A news item in the English edition of the Cairo news (Africa), dated ten years ago, hegins this startling series of picture events—

British Ship Zanzibar Founders Off East Coast—Frightful fate would await eastaways, as the country is uninhahited for hundreds of miles—then we are shown a raft in mid-ocean hearing the only two survivors of tbe lost Zanzibar—Capt. Jack Ownes and his daughter Essie. A few hours later we get a glimpse of the African shore line, showing the captain and his daughter hoth lying senseless where the remorseless waves have tossed them.

Five Years Later we see a rude cahin huilt of grass, mud and hrusb. The labor of its making has kept the hrave captain and his daughter from madness—the utter bopelessness of their heing rescued from this desolate region bas finally become a settled conviction with them both, so they live as best they can, fighting as primeval man had to fight for food and shelter ;the sea has washed ashore from the Zanzihar many things which have helped them in their present situation—the skins of animals protect them from the heavy dews of night, and the captain has learned through necessity to keep their larder stocked with his bow and arrows.

An evil day comes—the father is stricken with fever, and in spite of his daughter's loving care, he succumbs, leaving Essie alone. For weeks afterward the girl barely exists, hut at last the desire for life returns and hope—the feeling an all-wise Providence gives to humanity as a safeguard against our ills—regains possession of her mind and she fights on alone. One day in the woods she hears a wail—it sounds like the cry of an infant in distress. Upon investigation she discovers two haby leopards in the hollow of a tree; the girl hungers for companionship, so she determines to take the kittens to her home and as she reaches the door the mother leopard hounds into view. The girl, nothing daunted, clings to the babies. A strange scene follows—the fearless girl and the mother leopard hecome friends—she is alone no longer.

One Year Later—Two animal huyers are starting for the interior. We follow the interesting movements of these men. We see them pitch camp in the jungles, trap leopards and other wild animals.

Gates Finds Essie—A dense jungle; a white man with three native gun hearers is following a leopard track; suddenly he sees a magnificent speeimen lying contentedly in his path, he raises his rifle, a human voice utters a cry, and a beautiful girl, clad in leopard skins, falls with arms outstretched across the hody—Essie sees a human face and hears her mother tongue for the first time since her father's death.

A few weeks later Jordan starts hack with the first consignment of animals, leaving Gates to follow with the rescued girl. Essie has not only made friends with the leopard family, hut being gifted hy nature with a strange power over animals, she has taught them to obey her. We witness her giving Gates a demonstration of this power.

The girl is alone in the world, and upon her return to civilization must have a means of livelihood. Gates is a showman and knows that an act such as Essie will he ahle to give with her pets will prove a revelation to the jaded theatergoers of America and Europe, so he proposes the scheme to Essie. She has grown very fond of her rescuer and is willing to he guided by his advice. Gates puts his men to huilding crates, and we see the party start hack for civilization.

At Cairo, Loading the Animals on hoard o steamer hound for Paris. Then four weeks later we witness Essie's first public appearance. Gates has had scenery arranged to represent the girl's rude African abode, aud the transplanted leopards, thinking themselves hack in Africa with their Queen, obey her slightest wish, ot the delight of a vast audience, and as Gates takes the girl in his arms after her triumph, we see that the future bids fair to he as hright to Essie as the past has heen unkind—the desolate days spent in darkest Africa are forgotten. Length, 1,000 feet.

EDISON MANUFACTURING CO.

APPRENTICE BOYS AT NEWPORT NAVAL TRAINING STATION.—Short of an actual engagement at sea nothing in naval tactics presents a picture of such brisk action, picturesque effect and stirring qualities as a large landing party crashing through the surf in long boats, the men leaping and dashing through the water and then surging forward in a thin wicked line of attack on a semi-concealed enemy.

It is a thing full of fire, vim and dash, and it was the Goddess of Chance, smiling in one of her happier moods, that enabled the Edison Company to secure a picture of such an occurrence during the naval apprentice maneuvers at the Newport training station.

Nearly three hundred apprentices participated in this particular piece of "small boat" practice, which was carried out to the point of showing the men entrenched, firing and then advancing in heavy skirmish order.

It is a decidedly unusual scene, revealing the method of landing and of how our sea dogs conduct themselves when ordered ashore to fight as infantry.

Another interesting feature of the maneuvers was the "setting up" drill, executed by a full battalion of sailors, and a reproduction of this in pictures has been placed on the same reel with that showing the landing party and shore skirmish line.

There is a certain fascination in watching three hundred or more tars performing their movements in perfect unison that baffles description. Mere words could never convey an adequate idea of the charm of this picture.

It may be entertaining to know, in passing, that the "setting up" drill was performed in the open when the temperature stood somewhere around zero and the band accompanied the exercises by playing "In the Good Old Summer Time" in slow measure. Certainly a cheerful air for a cold day.

A COWARD.—We are shown a man of the world taking life lightly till suddenly he is confronted with that awful tragedy of death. While dining with his fiancee, after the opera, in one of the numerous Parisian cafes, she becomes very much annoyed by the constant gaze of a stranger seated at the opposite table.

Turn which way she might, there were those dark eyes staring boldly at her. At last, unable to stand it any longer, she calls her companion's attention to the ungentlemanly aud insolent conduct of the stranger.

Loud words are spoken between the two gentlemen. A blow, a challenge, and a duel to be fought at dawn, are the outcome of simply a look—yet what tragedy sometimes lurks in a glance of the eyes!

Midnight finds the Duke in his room arranging with his seconds for the duel at dawn. Filled with hot anger and excitement, he chooses pistols as the weapons and insists that the duel shall be fatal to one or both.

His old servant is instructed to call him at four in the morning, and the man of honor is left alone with his thoughts.

Two o'clock and the Duke is still awake. Deprived of sleep, and his hot anger cooled, the slow watches of the night begin to tell on his nerves.

The slightest noise in the street startles him. He cannot force the thought of the coming dawn from his mind.

Three o'clock and he is now pale and haggard. Self-pity and fear creep from the shadows of the room and drag him down to a nervous wreck.

His hand trembles. Glass after glass of wine fails to bring relief. His brain keeps crying to his body, "The dawn, the dawn, the dawn!"

He picks up the revolver from the table. It falls from his nervous grasp. His will fails to respond to the command, "Be steady be calm," while the lamp casts its golden beams over a grinning death's head that lies on the table.

It mocks and jeers at him. He tries to shut it from his sight. At last his trembling hand reaches the light and turns it out, but through the window the pale moonlight steals and cheats him of his success.

The symbol of death only mocks him more in the moonlight. Oh, to shut it out of his sight! To stop his brain from crying out, "The dawn, the dawn!" At last he rises and closes the shutters. As the last beam catches his white, terror-stricken face, we see a Coward. A Coward stamped in every line, every feature.

The next moment the shutters are closed, and then darkness, silence. A sudden flash in the night and all is still!

At four the old servant comes in to call his master. As he throws aside the closed windows, the first faint rays of sunlight stealing through disclose to view the white, cold face of the Duke resting on the table, a tiny scarlet stream gliding from beneath his left temple across the white paper, and losing itself in the gloom. The sun shines strongly on the face of the dead Duke, and the old servant knows then that it is dawn.

No more powerful silent drama has ever been presented upon the moving picture canvas than De Maupassant's famous story, "A Coward." It is a picture that cannot be forgotten.

A BLACKSMITH'S DAUGHTER.—Helen, the pretty daughter of John Wright, a blacksmith, is the belle among the working girls of a small village near New York.

Helen is a bit of a coquette and when she takes her father's lunch to him at his shop, she causes a flurry in the hearts of the blacksmith's two sturdy helpers, Jim and Tom.

Helen really cares for Jim, who is madly in love with her. When Jim sees Tom trying to make up to Helen, he challenges the rival to a fist fight, and we see the two giants at the rear of the shop punching each other for fair. Meanwhile Arthur Langley, a handsome stranger from the city, has ridden up to have a shoe put on his horse. While the father is at work on the horse, Langley flirts with the beautiful daughter. The two rival smiths are still punching away at each other. Jim whips his rival, but his triumph is short lived, for when he comes back to Helen he finds her absorbed in the stranger and himself ignored.

The next day, in a picturesque spot in the woods, Jim finds Langley kissing the girl. Jim demands that she choose between them, and Helen goes to Langley. The next morning the girl elopes with Langley and she sends a note from a hotel in New York to her father, telling him that she is to be married to Langley. The distracted father shows the letter to Jim, who goes to New York.

Providing himself with a wedding ring and securing a minister, Jim calls on the eloping couple. Jim, with the aid of a pistol, makes Langley understand that if he wishes to be happy and keep lead out of his system he, Langley, will marry Helen right then and there. The minister enters and marries the couple and Jim departs.

A month later we find Helen enjoying the luxuries of life in New York, but a rude awakening is at hand. Langley is arrested by two detectives and the blacksmith's daughter is informed that "Langley" is really the notorious forger and bigamist "Boh Hayes."

The next day, crushed by a realization of her terrible mistake, Helen determines to end her misery by suicide. Jim reads in a newspaper of Langley's villainy and arrest and he goes to New York to help Helen. He finds in her room a note, telling her father that she is about to drown herself. Jim rushes frantically to the nearest dock. He is not an instant too soon, for the poor girl has just leaped into the water. Jim dives into the river and after a heroic struggle, saves Helen. An officious policeman comes up and declares that he must arrest Helen for attempting suicide. Biff! Jim's powerful first shoots out and Mr. Policeman goes into the river, and while he is struggling in the water, Jim carries Helen to safety.

Some months pass and Jim visits the house of his old boss the blacksmith, who is happy again in the possession of his dear Helen. Jim does not mention his love of the girl for whom he has done so much, but Helen's experience has taught her that "true hearts are more than coronets," and she tells Jim so. Jim takes the hint and the blacksmith's daughter becomes a blacksmith's wife.

This story is full of thrilling action; scenes that grip the heartstrings with pathos, and it is heightened by comedy that "belongs."

The fight between the smiths, the daring rescue of the girl from the river, and the beautiful love scene at the close will make audiences take notice and tell their friends that this is a real play worth seeing.

LUBIN MANUFACTURING COMPANY 926-928 MARKET STREET PHILADELPHIA, PA.

in defense of his home. The Captain departing warns the private. The next scene shows us a military squad at drill; next we find Private Brown on guard duty; here the Captain plans revenge; approaching Private Brown on pretext of inspection of arms, assults him, the Captain pours whiskey down his throat, placing the flask in his pocket, returns to camp, reports the private as drunk on his post and as having assaulted his superior; a squad is sent out to bring him into camp.

The private's wife hurries to the prison camp and hears from her husband the facts. The next scene is the court marshal with its sentence of guilt. The private is sentenced to be shot.

Captain Mann, thinking to break the news to the private's wife, also to renew his attentions, hastens to her home. The loyal wife sees him coming, enters the house to await his arrival. As he raps at the door she comes upon him from the rear and greets him with a command that he write a confession of his guilt. With the confession in hand, the instrument of salvation for her husband, she forgets the villain before her, who springs upon her, knocking the revolver from her hand and struggles to regain the signed confession. The loyal wife battles for the document, but by brute strength the Captain strangles her into unconsciousness and gets it, just as the child rushes upon the scene and grabs up the revolver ordering the Captain away.

The child follows the Captain, who upon reaching the river tears up the confession and throws it into the water. The child seeing, wades into the water for it and hurrys home and shows it to her mother. They start for the Colonel's headquarters, but the mother weak and exhausted stops on the road while the child hurries ahead, reaches camp, meets the Colonel, to whom she tells her story and secures a stay of execution. An orderly and the child rush off for the execution grounds.

In the meantime, the mother has recovered strength sufficient to ask of a countryman riding along the road the use of his horse, she rides off at full speed to the rescue. The orderly and the child hear her coming in her mad dash to save her husband and to give her cheer wave the reprieve that she might know that there was still hope. She sees and urges the horse still faster and as she dashes past grabs the reprieve from the hands of the orderly and rushes upon the execution ground just to late to get the attention of the execution squad, who have leveled their guns at her husband and await the order to fire. In desperation she whips out a revolver and firing strikes the outstretched arm of the Captain as he is about to command fire.

The confusion gives her time to ride in with the reprieve and so save her husband.

For the General Betterment

Gradually and by degrees the moving picture industry is assuming, not only apparent, but actual cohesiveness of its various elements, which are essential to its well being, as they are essential to the well being of all other industries. The disposition of manufacturers, exchanges and moving picture exhibitors to work in harmony for their own interest and the interest of the public, was made clearly evident to us during our recent visit to Chicago. There, as the result of many interviews and personal inquiries, we obtained many data that have more than ever strengthened our belief that, especially out West, the industry is being solidified and strengthened so thoroughly that its future seems mroe than ever assured.

In the good work of personal effort and inquiry the industry will be gratified to learn that Mr. George Kleine has recently taken a prominent, if unostentatious, part. Mr. Kleine's business status, as all the world knows, is that of head of one of the largest optical houses in the trade. He is also the American distributor of the renowned Gaumont and Urban-Eclipse films. Moreover, the fact that he has always taken a leading position in the industry and is universally respected, lends additional weight to any public action of Mr. Kleine.

Recently he has made a tour of many scores, if not hundreds, of moving picture theaters in the great section of which Chicago is the center. This tour was undertaken for the purpose of obtaining a general idea of the condition of the moving picture business from the point of view of the exhibitors and the public.

First of all the general condition of the various moving picture houses was made the subject of special observation; then the films were examined with a view to ascertain their suitability or reverse; their condition, the way they were shown, and their reception by the public. In short, Mr. Kleine's object was to obtain an accurate idea of the prevailing state of things for the general advantage, and by arriving at such a basis of knowledge as would enable him in conjunction with those of his fellow members in the trade who have the best interest of the business at heart, to exercise such influence over the moving picture houses as would redound to the benefit of the business and to the advantage of the public.

Moving picture makers, and those interested in the business generally, have before now boasted to us that they never visit these places; our reply was that it was their duty to do so in order to acquaint themselves with the minute details of the business. After all, it is only by a careful study of what the public likes that one can arrive at a sound judgment in manufacturing affairs. It should be said that in this said tour Mr. Kleine was accompanied by Mr. W. N. Selig, who is also deeply interested in the betterment of the business.

We think this quiet work of Mr. Kleine is deserving of public mention as an example worthy of imitation, not only by manufacturers and importers, but also exchanges and others of prominence in the industry, who make it their business to keep in touch with what is being done at the thousands of moving picture theaters throughout the country. The moving picture business has recently passed through a series of very trying crises from which it has emerged clarified, and we think improved. But, to employ the well known simile, it is not yet quite out of the wood, it is still, if we may employ another metaphor, in the convalescent stage, and has to be carefully nursed and nurtured after the rough handling it received several months ago. Therefore, it behooves all interested in the complete recovery and final up-building of the patient to do all that lies in their power to strengthen it in public esteem, by assuring that only good and suitable pictures are shown in suitable houses, to which all sections of the great public may now resort in the absolute confidence that they will see a good, clean, elevating entertainment, at cheap prices, and amidst comfortable and agreeable surroundings.

Selig's—The Great Moving Picture Plant of the West

It is noon of a typical Summer day in Chicago as we enter the handsome offices of the Selig Polyscope Company, on Randolph street. Chicago cordiality greets us on every hand; we are made to feel that we are welcome; in short we have not taken half a dozen steps in Selig Land and we are quite at home. Everybody is frank, good natured and communicative.

We take a seat in Mr. W. N. Selig's private office, and we look down on the floor at all that is left of a quondam friend. It is the beautiful skin of that great lion which stalked so majestically through the famous Roosevelt film and was finally shot by the impersonator of the gifted and gallant ex-President, in the suburban wilds of Chicago. He was a great and popular lion and his end was a glorious one. There his skin lies to decorate the Selig sanctum and to be a monument for all time to the enterprise of the Selig Company.

Mr. Selig and ourselves had much to talk about, for we have this in common: that we both graduated from the same wet plate school of photography. Unlike many of the newer entrants in the moving picture field our host is no neophyte. He knows the game from A to Z. He went through that best of all schools: that of experience, and the result of all this is seen to-day in the proud pre-eminence of the Selig Company.

A resume of the long and pleasant talk that we had with Mr. Selig would make good reading for the readers of this journal. It pleased us by the intimate knowledge in all branches of photography, which Mr. Selig possesses. On the present occasion, however, we are obliged by the exigencies of space to confine this account strictly to the moving picture end of things. And so we at last take a temporary farewell of Mr. Selig and his lion skin and are whisked off by courteous and attentive guides to the famous open air moving picture plant in suburban Chicago.

It would do the millions of admirers of the Selig pictures an immensity of good to see only the exterior of this great installation. The vast rectangular plant includes several buildings, so that as one approaches it one gets the sensation of things being done inside on a great scale. Long before we get to the door we are conscious of an impression that the moving picture is handled masterfully in the Selig works. The very name of the company in mammoth letters on the outer walls contributes to this effect. The tall buildings heighten that effect. So that as we enter the office we are in a state of wonderment as to what lies beyond those far reaching walls.

We are soon to see. Tom Nash takes us in hand. Tom is the manager of these great works. There is a smile of self confidence on his face as he leads us into the open arena, a smile that proceeds from success and knowledge: success of which he has a full share as manager, and knowledge that success only comes from hard and practical work. That is how we size up Tom Nash.

We think he turns the corners of his eyes upon us, as we look out upon the most amazing scene in moving picturedom. We stand still and probably gasp. Where are we? In a corner of Coney Island? At one of the numerous beaches around New York City? At a Chicago pleasure resort, or where? These are the thoughts that rapidly pass through our mind at the first view of the Selig outdoor moving picture works.

The vast field is dotted with painted scenes; the sides of houses, guns, wagons and such an illimitable and heterogeneous collection of moving picture accessories that the first impression made upon us is that of a country fair. A tame deer rubs his nose against our hand. Three young bears gamble in front of us. There is a stable full of horses. Think of it, moving picture men!

Most wonderful of all is a great lake in which we feel tempted to plunge this blazing hot day. On the top of two lofty wooden structures are men with moving picture cameras, and there are other cameras on terra firma. But what are the great crowds of men, of girls and children that are scattered over the field? What are they doing? Enjoying themselves? Evidently. And they are doing something more: they are working at the making of moving pictures: they are the actors and actresses.

We stand and watch one moving picture in the making. The scene of this is a baseball field. Very old men are playing the game. When they started to play that game they were boys, but they have grown old and decrepit through waiting for the return of a striker, who many years before disappeared after striking the ball. Finally, the surface of the earth seemed to be agitated and the striker, also aged and worn, reappears, completes his run, whilst the fossilized players in the field stand round, applaud, and gesticulate. That is the rough idea as it presents itself to our mind. It is all very quaint and amusing and some day no doubt the film will be seen in the moving picture theaters.

From this fine piece of well prepared and acted work we are taken to Selig Lake, at one end of which stands Producer Turner. We all stand around him as, like a general in command of forces, he gives his instructions to the people at the other end. These people, mostly young and high spirited, are a picnic party. It is their mission at a particular part of the scene to seat an old gentleman on a swing, and at a prearranged moment to shoot him into the water. Turner has all the details well in hand, so well in hand in fact, that at the supreme moment, the old boy is shot, as it were, out of a catapult into the lake and swims frantically for the shore whilst the crowd of children set up a deafening series of shrill shouts and hurrahs. We all applauded the wonderful realism and "go" of this wonderful picture. And all the while the handle of the camera has been unflinchingly turned by Maestro Reimers, who has done his part in perpetuating one of the prettiest moving pictures we have seen in the making.

It is almost with regret that we quit the scene of merriment and activity for the interior of the Selig works. We enter the great studio where a company of adult actors and actresses are waiting to play their parts in an interior scene. This studio is large enough to accommodate scores of actors and numerous horses. It is illuminated by daylight or electricity, the latter being of two hundred thousand candle power. We are shown two great cannon; these are to form some of the accessories of a Boer war picture, which will be produced very shortly in Selig Land.

We take a glance at other parts of these remarkable works. A special machine shop is set aside for the making of the Polyscope projector, which is being produced by a band of busy mechanics. In a fireproof vault the stock of films are kept, and we learn that there are several months' supply of negative and positive pictures on hand. In another room we see many girls handling, examining, testing and finishing the positive film before it is sent out to the exchanges. Then friend Nash leads us into gloom, namely into two large rooms illuminated only by dull red lights, in which, as it seems to us, two sets of machines are busily and unceasingly at work. One set of these machines is perforating the film; another set is printing it. The steady, rhythmic click, click, click of these machines tells this story: that each working day many thousand feet of celluloid films are perforated, exposed, printed, developed and dried in Selig Land.

Then we emerge from gloom into a series of developing, drying and toning rooms. The drums are at rest, for this part of the staff, in the recent high temperature, only did their work at night. One glance of the practiced eye assures us that here are all the facilities for handling an enormous output of film. So, still in charge of Tom Nash, we take leave of this busy hive of picture making and are led to the Annex. But what took place in the Annex is, as Kipling says, "another story."

We are more than impressed by the magnificent Selig works. Hundreds of people work there day by day, and they go to make up just one large, happy family. Alike in extent, completeness, variety of equipment and convenience, the Selig works constitute one of the wonders of the moving picture world. Tom Nash and his merry men can produce almost anything there: a battle, a lion hunt, a melodrama, a sporting picture, a comedy, a spectacle of any kind. All is fish that comes to their nets in the way of moving picture making!

THE STORIES OF THE FILMS.

We have hitherto given considerable of our space to printing each week the stories of the week's film releases. That this has been appreciated and of use to our readers, we have ample evidence. But as almost all the manufacturers are now sending, or offer to send, free to the exhibitor, their weekly bulletins, we do not see the necessity of repeating the stories of the films in these pages. Before discontinuing the custom we would like to hear from our readers. We wish to make this paper of the greatest service to them and therefore ask them to kindly give us their opinions as to whether the space could be filled with matter of more general interest.

"PALMAM QUI MERUIT FERAT."

The Moving Picture World has given considerable attention to the producing end of moving picture making and we have had ample evidence that the influence we have exerted has made for the betterment of the business. New talent has been unearthed, latent talent has been encouraged, and the consequence is that there has been marked improvement in this department of the work.

It is only natural that when any producer succeeds in making a popular film, he should indulge in some measure of self-congratulation. Among the gentlemen who have come prominently to the front in this work is Mr. Joseph A. Golden, now of the Centaur Company. Our own pages have born testimony to his skill and ability and we hope to have many more opportunities of paying tribute to his achievements. Recently, by an oversight on our part, pardonable, if not excusable, in the occasional hurry of newspaper production, our pages gave publicity to a statement in regard to Mr. Golden that we believe he himself will deprecate, if not disavow. This statement says: "To him (Golden) must be credited the unusual success of the Biograph Company and their productions, for . . . he had written for them and staged over 400 productions . . . which were all record-making successes."

Homer is said to have nodded, and we must frankly own to have been nodding when we allowed Mr. Golden's press agent to make such a sweeping statement. The success of the Biograph Company, or of any other company, relies not upon the efforts of any individual employee, however gifted, a fact in which we believe that Mr. Golden will concur. The success of any great concern can generally be traced to a master mind, who may remain in the background, but whose influence permeates the establishment and upon whose choice depends the selection of the employees who work out the success of the firm. A moving picture play is the production of many minds: the writer, the producer, the photographer, the workers in the dark room; in fact, the whole staff of a well-organized working force. Therefore, for any one man to claim the credit of any unusual success argues thoughtlessness or an exaggerated idea of their own importance. Mr. Golden has proved himself to be a sketch writer and producer of more than ordinary ability, but he has no doubt learned that there are other things that are necessary in the production of successful films. His present business associates are conspicuous for their enterprise and we are sure that in the future they can well afford to let their work stand strictly on its own merits—after all, the only key to success in moving picture making.

Too much light in a moving picture theater is a serious drawback to the proper display of the pictures. The other evening, in company, with a friend, we paid a visit to one of the best houses in New York City, Keith & Proctor's, Twenty-third street. The moment we entered the auditorium we remarked to our friend: "There is too much light in the house." And so it proved to be. As we took our seats we could see to read a newspaper that we carried. The effect of this unnecessary volume of light was to degrade the brilliancy of the pictures on the screen, which appeared to the audience to have somewhat of a misty look. Also, the pictures did not seem to be put on with the usual perfection for some reason. Messrs. Keith & Proctor, you have established for yourselves a high standard which your large and steady clientele will demand that you live up to.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

CHAPTER XV.

SPEED.

The matter of speed is of much importance, but no rule can be laid down governing it. Speed must be left entirely to the discretion of the operator, except that with inflammable film forty feet per minute is as slow as is safe, with ordinary light. Theoretically, the machine speed should be the same as that of the camera which took the picture being projected, but in practice this is often far from true. The camera man grinds out a set speed, supposed to be forty feet per minute, though often he varies widely from the mark. The actors act the scene as seems best to them, but ofttimes when the scene is projected it is discovered they have misjudged the speed of action necessary for best effect. Right here is where a really good operator who closely watches such details becomes of great value, helping out the scenes amazingly merely by changing speed on different scenes. Take, as an example, Pathe's "Faker's Dream." If run straight through at camera speed the film is dull and of comparatively little effect. Where the actors are moving about their speed is too great and while on the various amusement devices of the park the speed is altogether too slow. But by running about a fifty foot speed in the first instance and close to seventy-five in the other, the film creates much laughter, but it is necessary to change speed radically many times on this film. Another example is "A Ride for a Life," by Edison, I believe. If run at normal speed while the auto ride is on, the "Ride for a Life" develops into a howling farce, but if speeded up just as fast as you can run, it is excellent, but as the ride is cut three or four times in its length by other scenes, you have to slow down for each of them or the farce would be reversed. As an example the other way, we all know that the slower the Passion Play is run the more impressive it is. Forty feet per minute is best for it. The only rule for speed, except in starting the machine, which should always be done slowly, is, "Watch your subject and be governed entirely by its action." Twenty-five minutes is the extreme limit of time for 1,000 feet of film. Fifteen to twenty minutes is ordinary time for most subjects, and only once in a great while will you get a thousand foot film that may be run through in less than fifteen minutes—none more than one minute less. Ordinary time for ordinary reels of film is about eighteen minutes. Divide length of film by 60 and result will be about the number of minutes it will consume at ordinary speed.

THE THROW.

There is a misunderstanding among most operators regarding the throw, i. e., the distance the picture is projected. Within reasonable limits the throw has very slight effect on the brilliancy of a given sized picture, provided the atmosphere be reasonably clear. In clear atmosphere the writer would as soon project a fifteen foot picture one hundred feet as fifty. It must be remembered, in this connection, that you are passing a certain intensity of light through the aperture plate. This light is to be distributed over a given amount of space. An open arc lamp, a candle or a lamp diffuses its rays in every direction and over a complete circle, but the light from your lamp, at least all which passes through the aperture plate, is confined to a space the size of your picture. Every bit of light which passes through the film reaches the curtain, save the amount diffused by impurities in the atmosphere, and that for a distance of even 150 feet is very slight. Of course, there is some loss, and if the throw were extended to several hundred feet it might be considerable, but I make the unqualified claim that it amounts to nothing appreciable in 100 or even 150 feet. In fact, some operators claim that a better picture is had at 100 feet than at 50 by reason of the fact that the long focus lens is a better article than is the short focus. When you increase the size of the picture, however, it is quite another story, for you are then diffusing your light over a greater area, and this counts rapidly. With a picture 8 x 10 you cover a space of 80 square feet, while a 12 x 14 picture takes up 168 square feet, or more than twice the area. You are therefore lessening your illuminating power by about one-half with the larger picture, or rather you are lessening the brilliancy in that degree. The writer wishes there was a lens of long enough focus to project a ten or twelve foot picture 500 feet. He would like to try it, and would wager that, given clear atmosphere, he would get a good picture at that distance with the light ordinarily used.

THE ELEMENTS OF ACCURACY IN MOVING PICTURE MANUFACTURE.

By Arthur S. Newman.

Having glanced in a somewhat cursory manner at the different types of perforating machines, before leaving the subject of perforation, it will be well to look again carefully at the finish of the first operation, or I should say the product—perforated film. I will repeat, "Without good perforation, good resuts, steady pictures, cannot be produced with the type of machinery now in general use."

Perfect perforation requires, first, that each succeeding pair of holes shall be precisely the same distance from its preceding pair as from the pair following; second, that each pair of holes shall be rigidly at right angles to the direction of the film; third, that each pair shall be symmetrically placed between the edges of the film, and, fourth, that each pair shall be equidistant measuring across the film. According to present usage, there should be 64 pairs of holes, and 64 spaces in each foot run of the film. The holes also should be suitably shaped, and cleanly cut.

With a condition of excellence falling, in some particulars, short of the above standard, it is still possible to obtain good—even the best—results as regards steadiness. If two or four pairs of holes be perforated at one operation, it is extremely likely that the resulting film will not stand the test of the first condition above stated, because it is almost impossible to construct multiple discs and punches so accurately that errors cannot be detected fairly easily. The film will of course partake of these errors. We will suppose the spacing mechanism of the machine to be perfect between successive operations of the group of punches; then at every second or fourth hole, as the case may be, the first hole of a series will be at a definite distance from the last hole of the previous series. As each group of two or four holes is produced, by an unvarying arrangement of punches, the same errors—should they exist—will be found in each group, consequently the distance from a certain hole in one group to the corresponding hole in the next group will always be the same amount. Now, this is just the condition which, if fulfilled, will exactly suit the apparatus now in general use. The presumed inaccuracies being continually repeated, and also being equal to the whole picture in the case of the four-hole machine, and occurring twice in the size of a picture in the two-hole machine, will insure every fourth hole being equally spaced throughout the whole length of the film, and the result will be as good as if the perforations had been all exactly equidistant, because the finished pictures themselves will be equidistant in spite of the inaccuracies of the holes. All the machines which are required to deal with the film after it leaves the perforator have the characteristic that their mechanism acts on one part of the film, while the light, for either taking, printing or projecting, acts at the same time on another portion one or more picture lengths removed; and even with the inaccuracies above indicated, this length will be an unvarying amount. To insure this condition, either one, two or four holes must be made at each operation; three holes will not do, the number not being an aliquot part of four holes, i. e., the size of a picture.

Let us now look at the advantages and disadvantages of the different types of perforators. The old "Rotary" is by far the most simple and expeditious, but produces no accurate work. The four-hole type comes next in rapidity of output, and if built on the "guide pin" measuring system will do very excellent work expeditiously; its disadvantage lies in its great first cost, and especially in the cost of its upkeep. If the slides which guide the punches are not kept in first class condition the punches and dies soon wear, and the renewal of these is very costly indeed.

The two-hole machine is not quite so expeditious in turning out work; if on the guide-pin system of measurement the work will be slightly more accurate than that of the four-hole machine; the first cost is decidedly less high and the upkeep considerably cheaper. The one-hole machine is less costly to make, will do the most accurate work, and be by far the most easy to keep in proper order; it also has the great advantage that its gauge can be easily lengthened or shortened, so that negatives can be produced having, after development, the same gauge as the positive film on to which they are to be printed. This, as will be explained when we come to the printer, is an important matter, as it tends to insure accuracy in the printing operation. Against these advantages must be set the drawback of its being the slowest of all machines in output.

Like the other types, to be of the utmost accuracy it must be built on the "guide-pin" measuring principle. It then possesses the good quality that all holes in the perforated film are easily kept equidistant, and the films are less liable to wear or tear when run on the sprockets of the projector, as all the teeth in gear with the film are much more likely to take their share in the pull on the film at one and the same time. We are now ready to deal with the camera and its vagaries and peculiarities, which will form the subject of the next article.

THE MELIES COMPETITIONS.

In accordance with many requests, we give renewed publicity to the rules of the Melies competitions, which are attracting great attention in the moving picture field. Mr. Melies offers the following prizes for scenarios for moving picture plays, farcical, comical, dramatic, melodramatic or spectacular: First prize, $150; second prize, $75; third prize, $50; seven prizes of $25 each for the next best scenarios, $175; total, $450.

Ten dollars will be paid for all other manuscripts accepted. The names of the prize winners, if it be so desired by the author, will be printed on the picture. The names of the judges were announced in last week's World.

The rules governing the competition are as follows: All manuscripts must be typewritten on one side only. All manuscripts must bear a single fictitious name or motto and must be accompanied by a sealed envelope bearing fictitious name or motto and with the author's real name and address enclosed. Manuscripts must not be rolled; they must be sent flat or folded. Scenarios must be original and full of action and life. No lines are spoken, the action must tell the story. Competitors may submit as many scenarios as they choose. The competition will close September 5, 1900. All manuscripts submitted are subject to the rules governing this competition. To insure the return of rejected manuscripts, postage covering same must be enclosed. All manuscripts must be marked "For Competition" and addressed to G. Melies, 204 East Thirty-eighth street, New York.

In reference to these competitions we have received the following letter, which is typical of many similar inquiries that have been addressed to us:

"Relative to Mr. George Melies' offer for prizes for scenarios for m. p. plays, would like to ask just how they are written? Are just the successive scenes and the general plot of the story given, or is it written out completely with all the 'business' and 'lines' for the different characters, in fact, like the manuscript for a regular play? There are probably many of your readers who have good ideas for m. p. plays who do not know exactly how to write the scenarios. J. R. R.

"Savanna, Ill."

The best thing that our correspondent can do before writing out his scenario or moving picture play is to study the elementary rules of this kind of literary composition. The most useful book on the subject that we know is by the English author, Jerome K. Jerome. It is called "How to Write a Play." It is published in London, price about a dollar; but a copy of it can possibly be obtained of Samuel French, the theatrical publisher, of New York City. There is also another book on the subject by Mr. Price, an American writer. "J. R. R." and our other correspondents had best, therefore, get a copy of one of these books. Mostly moving picture film makers require only the scenes and general plot of a story, but we think they would probably prefer the entire piece, fully written, which is why we indicate the two books that tell how the work is done.

"ROSA ROSETTA"

Is the title of a catchy song which is put on with one of the smartest sets of slides ever produced. The selection of the scenes, the posing of the figures and the coloring are of a much higher order than one would expect to see in the work of a comparatively new concern—for the Climax View Company have only lately entered the song slide field. But they have made good.

MOVING PICTURES IN THE CHURCH.

In order to induce a larger attendance at his services, the pastor of a Baptist place of worship, at Macon, Ga., has adopted illustrated songs and motion pictures in place of a regular sermon. An illustrated lecture is the principal feature of the service. Jerusalem and other Biblical places are shown by moving pictures and illustrated hymns are also sung. If this daring innovation is a success in Georgia, and we see no reason why it should not be, we may surely look for its early imitation in other parts of the country. Why not?

Observations by Our Man About Town.

Labor Day is generally looked upon as the marker for the amusement season's opening and the one soon to be at hand is a magnet commanding the greatest attention. In about three weeks it will be here and then the prospects for the Fall and Winter season will begin to assume shape. Repeated inquiries are made of those who are supposed to be qualified to judge as to what the season will bring forth. The writer has been honored in many quarters by being credited with this qualification and, in an endeavor to justify the confidence, will venture a prediction. The coming year will be the best the moving picture people have ever had. Confidence in this direction has never been more generally expressed nor more firmly justified. Renters of firms are enthusiastic over the outlook. Exhibitors are more conservative, but every one of them is getting ready for business. The hardest part of the Summer season is on the wane. Many of the exhibitors are commencing to reopen their places in the cities and larger towns as a try-out. Whenever the evenings have been moderate in temperature the experiments have been very gratifying. The results do not warrant permanent reopenings, but they have shown the pictures are favorites with the people and when the proper time comes, when people can patronize the auditoriums, the nickelettes, the happy hours, etc., etc., without fear of sweltering, they will be on hand in large numbers with the nickels and dimes. The carpenters, electricians and decorators are now reaping a harvest. Picture places that have been closed for many weeks are passing through pleasing transformations and within the next three or four weeks the doors will be thrown open to the patrons. Many houses are displaying signs announcing that they "will open the latter part of August." Some wiseacres say this is a little premature because we will have a late Summer. They may be right, but all the regular theaters will adhere to the custom that has prevailed for year and years, and the picture houses will fall in line. Business may not be so good for the start, but after Labor Day it will commence to pick up, and by the middle of September the good old times will begin to reappear.

It is hoped this brilliantly painted picture will not be misunderstood. The pictures will be more popular and bring more revenue to the exhibitors during the coming year than in any preceding one, provided all conditions are equal. Much will depend upon the manager. The one who will make his house attractive and comfortable for his patrons will share in the prosperity. The other fellow is going to lose out. This will be the last season for that other fellow. The small picture hall that rests solely upon the pictures and has no surroundings that invite patronage is a thing of the past. Many of them will not survive the season. Large picture theaters are being located in all sections and are backed with plenty of capital that is being spent liberally. Ten-cent theaters are on the increase. Good vaudeville talent will be plentiful. The five-cent theaters will soon pass away. Increased investments as now forecasted mean high standard of entertainments. The bill boards of the better class of picture theaters will announce some surprising vaudeville numbers. Theatrical agencies have prepared themselves and now make a feature of acts for picture shows. They are also offering the services of professionals to talk with the pictures. It can hardly be expected that five-cent theaters will be able to stand the expense of securing this kind of talent, but in every locality where a house does not produce the goods a ten-cent house will be planted. Men and combinations with ample capital are seeking locations everywhere and it really looks as if the exhibitor who is in the business for a living is doomed to be pushed out unless he is able to keep up with the times.

During the past two months a number of operating concerns have been formed in many parts of the country and early in the Fall there will be in operation scores of circuits of moving picture theaters, some of them embracing as many as fifty or sixty locations. These circuits will be operated on a basis similar to that upon which chains of stores in the commercial line are conducted. No one place will be expected to make large returns on the individual investment, but the combined surplus of all the places will afford a good dividend on the outlay. The activity in this connection has no doubt been one of the incentives that led booking agencies that have heretofore catered to the straight vaudeville to turn their attention to the moving picture field. It is undeniable that the inroads the pictures have made on the vaudeville houses have reduced the engagements and earnings of vaudeville actors. The forming of the picture circuits opens a new field for these people. While they will probably not be able to get the salaries they received under the old conditions, they will be able to get steady work for thirty or forty weeks in the year. Good pictures and good vaudeville at ten cents, or ten and fifteen cents, is going to make a big boom for the pictures.

Many incline to the opinion that the introduction of vaudeville acts in houses that have heretofore had only moving pictures is an acknowledgment that the pictures are losing their grip upon the people. In this they are mistaken. There are times when there can be too much of a good thing. The people, the world over, want a change. Everything becomes monotonous at some time or another, no matter how well it may be liked. For this reason advanced vaudeville is now being introduced. And it must be vaudeville of more than ordinary character. If it is not the people will demand that it be cut out and only pictures put on. This was shown in several instances last season where some managers tried to compete with neighboring houses. They put on an inferior grade of vaudeville—amateurs in the business—and the box office receipts showed such a decided drop that they quickly switched back to straight pictures. If a manager cannot put on good vaudeville acts he had better stick to the old line. The public is too keen to be fooled by imitations and will quickly turn its patronage to the better grade.

Among the features that may be looked for during the coming season in the picture field are lecturettes. I believe that is the name that is to be given them. It is intended to have historical and educational subjects run while a lecturer talks upon them. It is practically a revival of the old stereopticon lectures. This will be a strong feature in lyceum work, but it is intended to introduce it also in the picture theaters. One of the lecturers who is preparing for this line of work has secured extensive bookings. He will create a revival of interest in such subjects as "Napoleon," "Washington," "Nathan Hale," "The Pilgrims," tales of frontier life, "Julius Caesar," "Virginius," etc., etc. Another enterprising fellow intends to book himself for a talk on "The Play and the Picture." His idea is to talk on pictures adapted from, or closely resembling, plays that have become popular and enlighten audiences that may not have seen the original productions on details that are not clearly brought out by the announcements connected with the moving picture.

OLIVER.

A PROGRESSIVE EXCHANGE.

The Film Import Company's New Offices.

The upward tendency of the moving picture industry is manifesting itself in all directions. A marvellous improvement in the condition and conveniences of moving picture houses has been concurrent with the steady growth in quality of the pictures, and the film importers and exchanges have joined in the sumptuary advance with ardent faith in the maxim that whatever is worth doing is worth doing well. They have very properly "put their houses in order" and the result is that to-day the offices and stores of progressive film exchanges are amongst the handsomest in the city.

Notable to embrace the opportunity of showing the world that the exchange section of the moving picture industry is entitled to rank highly amongst modern businesses is the Film Import and Trading Company, of 12 East Twenty-third street, New York City, who are handling the Centaur Company's pictures. We have not seen more tastefully appointed offices and business rooms than those of the Film Import Company. The suite has all the dignity of bank premises, with the decorative effect of an art store. It is certainly calculated to affect the visitor with the importance of the film industry and the design of the company to do everybody justice.

Moreover, the officials of the company are handling the business which they have recently entered with decision, experience and judgment, all of which make for success.

Enterprise and thoroughness strike us as being the watchwords of The Film Import Company, which has in contemplation some striking developments of the moving picture business of which we shall shortly write in detail.

From far away Singapore, Straits Settlements, there has reached us a letter highly commendatory of The Moving Picture World, which is eagerly read by the officers and men of a certain British regiment stationed there. Singapore is well supplied with moving picture theaters, at one of which, recently, the Pathe film, "The Assassination of the Duke of Guise," evoked great enthusiasm.

ON THE SCREEN.

By "Lux Graphicus."

As you will have inferred from my two previous contributions to the "Screen," dear friends, I have, like Ulysses of old, been seeing many cities and strange men. Ulysses, you may remember, during his journeys fell a temporary victim to the wiles of a bold young lady, Calypso. It was a kind of a classical version of "I Love My Wife, But Oh, You Kid." Ulysses probably wouldn't have put it that way; he would have said something in Latin—that kind of Latin which we used to suffer from in our school days, and which we all hated so fervently. Anyhow, Ulysses cut out Calypso and went home to his spouse, Penelope, who, you may remember, dutifully darned socks in his absence.

Golden haired Calypso smiled sweetly upon me in the subterranean Chicago, but Ulysses-like, I declared for duty. And duty lay along many pleasant paths. Those paths took me through Selig Land. I wonder if my good natured mentor will forget the evening we spent doing the moving picture show round about Randolph street? Chicago men talk enviously of the delights of Broadway, New York. As an observer of life in many of the great cities of the world, I want to say that Chicago can be thoroughly proud of the varied entertainment, which it offers for human delectation.

I soon got eye to eye with publicity manager, Tom H. Quill, between whom and myself, as members of the Fourth Estate, a bond of sympathy quickly sprang up. In the great republic of letters, democracy is seen and felt at its best. All the world over newspaper men readily foregather, and while I listened to Quill's stories of his experiences, I was congratulating myself on having met a whole-souled, broadminded brother of the pen, in whose hands the Publicity Department, of his company's business, may safely be trusted. So Tom, here's to you, and may you prosper and multiply in the ratio of your desire.

Then Reimers took possession of me. Camera men are sometimes misanthropic persons, who take a gloomy view of things. And when I heard Reimers was Dutch, and saw him stolidly turn the handle, says I to myself, says I, "I am in for a serious proposition." But Reimers, however serious he may be with the handle in his hand, can't be serious without it, even if he tried. He just bubbles over with jokes. Two of these I wrote on my cuff, for use in the family circle the next wet Sunday afternoon. They would make even a corpse laugh, notwithstanding that they were alleged by other members of the company to have a suspicion of Mr. Jos. Miller about them. Reimers seems to have been everywhere on the face of the globe, to have done evrything and to know most things.

Th atmosphere of the West seems conducive to good humor. Selig Land is one vast expansive smile. "Wm." himself smiles all the time, so does his brother, so does my nocturnal mentor, so does Tom Quill, so does Reimers, and so, I believe, does Producer Turner, when he is not shouting himself hoarse to his legions of actors and actresses. By heavens, you must shout in that big moving picture field, where the animal kingdom disports itself in front of the lens. Rumor has it that in the sacred cause of moving picture making, an elephant is soon to be assassinated there. And that a few hippopotami and giraffes are to be butchered to make a moving picture holiday. So you see, Producer Turner must be a kind of benevolent Nero.

Let me see, who was that particular young lady, of our classical schooldays, who was all smiles? Oh, I know. It was Niobe. But never mind those dry and dusty classics; let's come down to modern times, and for Niobe read Nash—Tom Nash. Tom Nash is just the smilingest man in Selig Land. He smiled when he met me; he smiled me through the Coney-like field; he smiled me through the works, the dark rooms, the machine shops, the developing rooms, the stables, the studio. Even in the Cimmerian gloom of the perforating room, I could feel Tom Nash smiling at and with me, and finally he smiled me away to Randolph street, where more smiles awaited me. Sunny Jim must have been a native of Chicago, (Ill.).

To tear myself away from smiling Chicago, required great physician effort. They don't seem to like to let you go. People are glad to see you; and when you talk of having to leave for the East or indeed to some other part of the West, the Chicago attitude is one of mild protest. People seem to say: "If Chicago is good enough to come to, it is good enough to stay in." "Now you have come," they assure you, "we want you to stay. There isn't, there can't be any other place but Chicago to live in. We are expanding, we are expansive, there is room for all, there is room for you, so why leave us? Well, if you must leave us, come back; come back soon, and stay longer than you did before." That's Chicago, the mighty metropolis of the mighty West.

THE WONDERS OF NATURE.

A Splendid Scenic Film by Essanay.

Due to the short time between the publication of our last two numbers, we failed to receive copy in time for change in some advertisements. We regret this especially in the case of the Essanay Company, as their fine scenic film, "The Wonders of Nature," should have been advertised and also have received creditable mention. The film was made in the famous Twin Falls country, southern Idaho, and is composed of a series of splendid motion views of the famous Shoshone and Twin Falls, and other points of interest in that country. Beautifully tinted throughout, skillfully handled by a competent photographer, this film is truly a work of art.

KLEINE SERVICE AND HALLBERG ECONOMIZER SCORE IN EFFICIENCY TEST.

The United States Government is now installing complete moving picture and stereopticon outfits for the benefit and amusement of both army and navy. Some of the army posts have been equipped and the Kleine Optical Company's Boston office is supplying service to the navy now manoeuvering on the New England coast. The equipment selected is naturally of the highest class and with the latest improvements which can be obtained. The Hallberg Economizer has been installed for the control of the moving picture and stereopticon lamps, and one installation in particular which may be mentioned is at Fort Slocum, New York, where a combination dissolving stereopticon and moving picture machine is used on 220 volts A. C. The Economizer is made to operate two 30-ampere lamps for the dissolver. When the lower lamp is shifted opposite the moving picture lens, by throwing a switch, the Economizer delivers 60 amperes to the lower lamp, as is required for this high-class moving picture work. There is no limit to the application and styles for which this economizer may be made. The only thing that is necessary is to have the specifications relative to the line voltage, cycles, length of throw, size of picture and make of carbon used. The double lamp Economizer is just the thing for the modern theater, as it enables the manager to operate a complete dissolving outfit in combination with moving picture machine, with only one Economizer at the highest possible efficiency and lowest first cost.

LOCAL VIEWS POPULAR.

The Star Theater, Athens, Pa., is making a decided hit with its patrons by using local views on the curtain for illustrated songs, the manager claiming that this is the first picture show to adopt this pleasing innovation.

The surrounding country is particularly adapted for scenes on the song slides, abounding with lofty mountains, picturesque valleys and the beautiful Susquehanna and Chemung rivers.

The operator at the Star, Bob Finch, has proven himself an adept at the art of reproducing nature's tints on the slides and the residents take an unusual interest in observing the beauty spots and popular faces that are clearly allied with home surroundings.

The manager says that the expense of obtaining the pictures is insignificant when compared with the box office receipts.

LAEMMLE SLOW BUT SURE.

The policy of the manager of Laemmle's New York office is to be commended and is an object lesson of business tact and foresight. We have seen film rental people in New York rent a vacant office in the morning and be open for business before night, or at least next day. These mushrooms faded as rapidly as they came into existence. Although Laemmle's has been open a month, not a reel has been rented, although orders have come in. Not until everything is ready to handle any amount of business with assurance of satisfaction will the curtain be lifted. We understand that this may be the opening week.

Comments on the Week's Films.

THE LEOPARD QUEEN (Selig).

Back again in our old familiar seat, in our old familiar theater, studying the pictures, as we love to study them, at leisure and in comfort. And it is a remarkable coincidence, that the first feature film to attract our notice is the Selig "Leopard Queen." This is a character production of the famous Chicago house, in which the wonders of natural history and the tender passion are adroitly mixed with game hunting, foreign adventure and stage life of a kind.

A British ship having foundered off the East Coast of Africa, a girl and her father are among the castaways. After a time the latter dies, and the girl becomes something of a Queen of the Animal Kingdom, controlling and dominating amongst other things some beautiful leopards. By and by into this "Adamless Eden" there penetrates an expedition in search of animals, with the discovery of the Leopard Queen by the head of the party, who falls in love with the girl and she with him. Having successfully demonstrated her powers over the animals, the Leopard Queen and her pets are shipped to Paris; in the Hippodrome of which city we see her going through her performance to the plaudits of an appreciative audience. She seemed a nice girl and the hunter a nice man, and we hope they were married and lived happily ever afterwards. By the way, at the risk of being charged with hypercritism, we must point out that French is the common language of Paris, whereas the bill announcing the performance of the Leopard Queen was printed in English. But this is a trifle.

The Selig Company have worked out this attractive film in their customary lavish manner, and the impression that it made upon the audience at the time we saw it was extremely favorable. The jungle scenes are particularly luxuriant to look upon. The girl and her father act well, so do the hunters and their crowds of dusky auxiliaries, whilst the scenes in the jungle, which include the netting of a leopard, are scientifically staged. Essie, too, the Leopard Queen, shows perfect control over her bevy of leopards, whom she fondles and plays with as though they were merely kittens. This film is not the least of recent Selig successes and its photographic qualities are, if anything, an advance upon what has been done before. All concerned in the production of "The Leopard Queen" are to be congratulated.

THE BETTER WAY (Biograph).

In this charming idyll of Puritan life the Biograph Company make a welcome return to their best vein, for they give us a simple story, well acted and photographed. The poet tells us that "crabb'd age and youth cannot live together," but the Biograph dramatist conclusively proves the contrary. To ease her mother's position in life a young girl consents to marry an old farmer in preference to a young swain. It is a Puritan rendering of "Auld Robin Gray." After the marriage, however, she discovers that she does not love the 'Squire, and as the young lover is persistent, the 'Squire in order to assure her happiness, releases his bride. A somewhat inprobable course for a Puritan to take. She has not gone far with her young lover before his somewhat too demonstrative attentions cause her to turn from him in horror and make her way back to her mother's home. The old 'Squire has not ceased to love the girl, and so reconciliation is possible. It is brought about by willing agents. In a very tender final scene we see the girl on her knees to the old man, who lovingly forgives her, and so it is to be supposed happiness is in sight.

What we liked about the story was the clear and convincing manner in which it was told. The acting, too, was something superb. The four leading characters, the girl, her mother, the old man, the lover, played their parts with such earnestness that all illusions seemed lost to us, and the thing itself looked like life. The staging and the photography of the piece were exceptionally fine, and altogether we look upon "The Better Way" as another Biograph triumph, which will enhance the company's growing reputation as producers of American film drama par excellence.

"Humble Heroes."—A Raleigh & Roberts depicting the effort exerted by a humble mail carrier to perform his allotted task in the bitter cold and the deep snow of Winter. And when he falls, breaking his arm, his daughter takes the undistributed mail and finishes the route. The story is not sensational, yet there is a tender pathos about it which cannot fail to interest because it represents the honest effort of men and women to perform their work regardless of obstacles. The setting is to be especially commended. One seldom sees better rendering of snow scenery, the snow in place of being staring white having texture and strength. Some of the views were veritable pictures and deserve numerous repetitions for that alone. Altogether this is an inspiring film and may well be included in any programme.

"Mishaps of a Policeman."—A film released by Harstn & Co. representing the difficulties of a policeman who seemed determined to make mistakes, no matter how hard he tried to perform his duty properly. It must be said, however, that the picture possesses little point and one really does not understand what his superior officers ordered him to do. Technically there is no fault. But the story is obscure.

"The Vengeance of the Lion Tamer."—A Harstn & Co. release which has strong dramatic elements. The jealousy of a lion tamer leads him to entice the woman into the den of lions and leave her there to be devoured. The lions attack her in plain view of the audience, but are driven away and she is rescued from her perilous position and finally recovers to wed the man of her choice, while the tamer is carried away by the officer. Aside from this sensational episode the picture has little interest, but such a blood-curdling production as that one scene is certain to attract attention. The photography of the film is scarcely up to the standard, though the interiors are difficult and much of the night scenery is hard to manage so as to give the appearance of night and yet make a clear picture. The film will be popular because it furnishes a thrill, which is what the average person likes.

"The Spanish Girl's Revenge."—A Phoenix which keeps the audience wondering what the end will be from the time it appears until the close. The title leads one to expect something that might be objectionable in the way of murder or suicide or something else gloomy and disagreeable, but really the film presents a high class comedy. It is not too much to say that it is one of the best comedies that has appeared on the screen in a long time. And not until the disappointed burglars open their bags far out on the prairies and discover that their money has been exchanged for iron washers and bits of paper is the story understood. There are numerous funny and, at the same time, dramatic situations and in each instance it seems as though the time had come when blood was likely to flow, but some absurd turn is given to the affair and no one is hurt. The film is good technically, the only objection being the obtrusiveness of the painted scenery. "The Spanish Girl's Revenge" is a welcome change from some of the silly pictures that are shown as comedies and the Phoenix people are to be commended for their good work. The suggestion is made, too, that they follow the same high class comedy type. They are such a change from many of the others that they will be popular wherever the people are given an opportunity to see them.

"Laurels."—A Gaumont illustrating different varieties of laurels, such as the schoolboy laurels, the sovereigns' crowns and the reward of the winner in ancient times, the real laurel wreath. The pictures are delicately tinted, and while they admit of no particular strength in acting, being records of the crowning of different classes of people with varying laurels, the series is entertaining and leaves a pleasant impression. The pictures are technically good and the idea of framing each one in a laurel wreath adds to the effect.

"A Long Reach."—A comedy from the Gaumonts which turns upon a policeman who had an exceptionally long arm, which enabled him to perform certain remarkable feats in captures and otherwise which would have been impossible for one less favorably situated. Many of the situations are comic, and the entire picture is amusing and entertaining, without descending to silliness. Technically there is little to be desired.

"Maid of the Mountains."—An Essanay drama based upon the search of revenue officers for a certain illicit still. The deputy sent to investigate and discover the still falls in love with the daughter of the chief operator and dallies away two weeks without accomplishing anything, and would have done nothing then only he was called to account very sharply by his superior. The audience is treated to a series of interesting pictures, including some good scenery among the woods and mountains, a part of which is a cave in the rocks in which the still is located. The girl warns the deputy that he is discovered by the operators and because she does this is turned out by her father. The deputy discovers her crying on a log in the woods, and the usual thing happens. He takes her back to her mother. Then comes his sharp reprimand and the information that his superior is coming to investigate. That complicates matters seriously and gives the deputy an opportunity to tell the girl he is going to do his duty. Then the girl does hers and warns the men that the marshals are after them. Her father escapes, but all the rest are captured in their cave. The climax comes when the deputy follows the girl and her father to their home and is about to put the handcuffs on him when she steps between. After considering for a moment he throws the handcuffs on the floor and tears off his badge and hurls it away from him, clasping the girl in his arms. This picture could well have been called between love and duty, for that is really what it amounts to at the end.

"Pompey's Dream."—A Pathe which gives a striking illustration of the adventures which befell one Pompey who came home drunk and laid down to sleep it off. His experiences in heaven and hell are very vividly shown and the terrors which beset him in the latter place are so strougly impressed upon him that he smashes every bottle in sight as soon as he wakes up and swears in his wife's embrace that he will drink nothing but water henceforth. And really after undergoing such harrowing experiences there is small wonder that he makes this emphatic vow.

"The Sacrifice."—A short drama from the Pathes which is strong and exceptionally well acted. It is a story of duplicity on the part of a man who is making love to two women at the same time, of a starving tramp stoned and driven away for clutching a piece of bread from the hands of a boy, and his rescue by a determined woman. He, in turn, actually worships her, and when he sees a man whom he has before seen making love to another woman go away with his divinity, he follows. He informs the first woman of the duplicity and she follows the couple, only to see that the tramp's story is true. The climax comes when she raises a knife to stab the woman who has stolen her lover. The tramp steps between and receives the blow, saving the life of the one who befriended him. The story is not complicated and has the objection that it deals with a species of duplicity which might better be left off the screens, yet it seems to interest. Such occurrences are common enough, perhaps, but few like to admit it. The scenery in the film is unusually good, even for a Pathe, some of the picturesque setting being far above the usual order. The picture is strong because it is simple, and it is not difficult to follow the story to its conclusion. Perhaps it is sufficient that the woman who befriended a homeless tramp should owe her life to his intervention. It well illustrates the irony of fate and to that extent is additionally interesting.

"Apprentice Boys at the Newport Naval Station."—In this picture the Edison Company has given a good idea of one of the physical exercise drills and the drilling in landing and attacking through which all the apprentice boys in the navy have to pass before they can go on board the government ships. Inasmuch as it is a record film, educational in its character, it requires no special criticism. Such films are useful, however, and afford opportunity for thousands of people to see and understand about such things who could never see the practice at the station. Wherever a film like this is shown it is sure to increase interest in the navy and that is important. They have a patriotic influence as well as an educational value, consequently they serve two purposes effectively. The motion picture is destined to go hand in hand with the school book and the newspaper in the education of the masses.

"The Coward."—An exceptionally strong drama from the Edison studio based upon De Maupassant's story of the same name. It is hard to make the real strength and beauty of dramas of this character understood unless those who read the criticism have likewise read the story. Without a knowledge of what has been written it is almost impossible to understand the drama. And De Maupassant was a master of the short story. His delineations of varying types of character were even more vivid than Poe's and his stories are exceptionally effective for this reason. In this one the interest centers around a man who has been challenged to a duel, and his mental processes are described as the clock ticks off the hours through the night. The actor who does this in the picture has interpreted the part well. His expression, his movements and the hesitation which affects him are all strongly delineated. At 3 o'clock in the morning the expression on his face is horror and when a few moments later a flash is seen it is well understood that he has not waited for his opponent's pistol to do its work. He has done it himself. And when at dawn the servant enters and throws back the shutters, there he lies dead, one hand resting upon a skull which had fascinated him strangely during the working out of the drama in his mind during the night. Not alone the acting, but the staging and the photographic quality of this film are excellent. The tonal qualities have scarcely been surpassed by the Edison people and the staging of the picture is as good as any they have ever done. A drama like this is well worth while, but there is some question as to whether they are understood by a majority of those who see them. It requires a considerable knowledge of literature to follow some of the pictures which are shown, and which are better than the ordinary. And it is to be feared that a majority of those who patronize motion picture shows are not familiar with this French author's work. It is certain that many near the writer did not understand this picture and wondered what it all meant. The delineation of the mental processes of a man who becomes a coward when contemplating an approaching duel requires exceptional ability and a thorough knowledge of artistic possibilities, but there is always the probability confronting the producer that when his work has been accomplished, and he has brought out a masterpiece like this, that only a comparatively small number will understand and appreciate it. The Edison Company is to be commended for its work on this film and it should find a place wherever a high class picture is wanted in a programme.

"Traced by a Kodak."—The Kalem actors have woven a neat story around an accidental face in a Kodak picture. This isn't the first time that the Kodak has proved an able detective, but it is the first time that the idea has been worked out in motion pictures. It is a good drama, well acted and with all the possible dramatic interest developed. The heroine of the piece, a little girl, who is presented with a pony on her birthday, which is afterward stolen, deserves high praise for her work. It is exceptionally good, being sufficiently alive to be interesting without appearing strained or unnatural. The pony might well be commended, too, since he performs his part perfectly. The rest of the actors are merely accessories, the whole story centers around these two. There is a deal of silent sympathy when the little girl starts out, picture in hand, to seek for her lost pony and the impulse to congratulate her when she discovered it, is very strong. The punishment of the perpetrators of the deed is assured, which relieves one of the feeling that one really ought to take a fall out of the Gypsy. Along with the story goes good acting, as has been said, and the staging of the play is beyond criticism. It is not overcrowded and it is sufficiently well done to maintain the interest. The photographic quality is good, in all excepting one scene. Where the little girl appears on her pony in the closing scene the picture is weak, appearing as though it were blurred, but elsewhere it is clear and has full tonal graduations without the harshness which sometimes mars outdoor pictures. The actors are to be commended for allowing only the pony to be stolen. Some would have had the little girl stolen too, a feature which would not have added to the attractiveness of the picture and would have given it a touch of gloom which would have injured it seriously. While stealing ponies is not to be condoned, it is far better than stealing children, and the writer fancies that most audiences will agree with this sentiment.

"Lochinvar."—From the Edison studio comes an illustration of Scott's stirring ballad, and one must say at the start that the pictures help to a better understanding of the familiar lines. The ballad is stirring and the pictures are alive with energy and intense interest. Everyone knows the poem, how young Lochinvar came out of the West and under the very eyes of all the guirds in the castle carried away his bride. The producers exercised restraint in some directions. For example, the audience is not treated to a long chase to prove whether they are fleet steeds that follow. On the contrary the couple ride leisurely away and the knights follow quite as leisurely. The scene shifts and the couple are seen entering a monastery and when they have come out they have been wedded. The father and would-be bridegroom arrive just in time to congratulate them as they come from the altar. As Scott left it the bride and groom were never seen again, but in this instance perhaps dramatic necessities forced the meeting at the close. The staging of this piece is excellent. There is little to be desired and it must be confessed that the action causes a feeling of exultation, though the exit of Lochinvar and Ellen is not managed as spectacularly as it might be. One has to follow closely to see them when they go, yet this is the most important part of the piece and might be emphasized without injuring the balance of the drama. The photographic quality of the film is good, with the possible exception that it is a trifle dark in places.

"The Tobacco Edict."—A scene from the history of New York dated 1648 and reproduced by the Edison Company. The governor has posted an edict against smoking tobacco in the province. William the Testy actually issued such an edict, but it has remained for the Edison people to give the reason. His wife seized and broke his pipe and in his wrath he issued an order that would make every other man in the province as unhappy as himself. The spectacle of the revolt, when the imperturbable burghers assemble and proceed to smoke him out on his own doorstep is comical enough and when his wife discovers him smoking a pipe, which is held by one of the burghers, she tears up the edict and retreats from their gaze. The costumes and the old Dutch buildings of New York are faithfully reproduced. It is a short, but satisfactory picture.

"The Tragedy of Meudon."—A Pathe film d'art which will unquestionably take high rank in the silent drama. Perhaps nothing better has been done in some ways, though other pictures might please better than this, which has a murder and a death from remorse to make its details more or less harrowing. Three among the leading dramatic artists of France were selected to act the parts. Mme. Aime Tessandier, of the Comedie Francais; Mr. Varennes, of the Theater Rejane, and Mlle. Barat, of the Atenes, Paris, are the actors and its is unnecessary to say that the play seems to be more than a picture in their hands. It seems more as though the events portrayed were actually occurring before the audience. The story is one of those domestic tragedies which are not uncommon here. A daughter-in-law is assumed by the son's mother to supplant her in the son's affections. Murder follows as a result of this unreasonable jealousy, which is charged to the son, though really the mother is guilty. Just as the son is about to go to the gallows the mother confesses and saves him. He returns home to find that his mother in her remorse has suffered a stroke of paralysis and is beyond human aid. As the officers come to arrest her she falls dead in her son's arms. It is difficult to describe the power of the acting in this drama. The facial expressions, the gestures, all are parts of one of the msot attractive pictures seen in weeks, even though it has a succession of horrors. Perhaps this proves that it is not so much that tragedy is offered, as it is the way it is offered. In this instance so good is the acting that one lives the scenes with the participants and it seems to follow as a natural sequence that certain events must occur. It is difficult to see how the picture could be improved. The staging, the photographic quality, the acting are all parts of a harmonious whole which should be seen by every lover of moving pictures. Further, those who are preparing scenarios or are forming companies to act the silent drama should study this as a model. It seems perfect in every sense and may well be considered as the acme of the motion picture art. The scenario is simple, affording proof that it is not complicated and unnecessary scenery which makes a picture. Quite the contrary. It not infrequently mars it. In this instance the scene is laid first in a butcher shop, then in the simple home of the characters, and in each instance the staging is in accord with the sentiment of the piece. The manager who adds this to his programme will score one success.

"The Betrothed's Nightmare."—A picture without a manufacturer's mark, but possessing considerable technical merit. It is difficult to understand some of the scenes, since the sub-titles which should make them clear are missing. But there is a good deal of magic, showing mysterious appearances and disappearances, and one might well call it a nightmare. It could scarcely be called anything else. The most objectionable feature, where it was seen, was the jerky movement of the figures due, perhaps, to faulty operation of the machine. But whatever it was, the pictures were hard to follow because of this.

"The Power of Love."—A Centaur film which has strong attractions and won applause from the audience. It is partly laid in the West, and there is a holdup of an overland stage which is photographed so clearly and at such close quarters that it has a realism not often seen in a picture and one watches with breathless interest the operation of relieving the passengers of their valuables. Then when one of them breaks away and goes after the bandits, securing his valuables and some others, and drives one of them back in at the end of a rope, there is enthusiasm. A love story runs through it and when this same spirited young man returns, wealthy, to claim his sweetheart he finds her father in financial difficulties, which he immediately relieves, and the would-be bridegroom slinks out of sight forever. The picture is strongly melodramatic, but it is good, nevertheless, and holds the interest without any opportunity for losing it. The technical quality is good, with the exception of two scenes, which are a bit dim, probably because the photographer underexposed his film, and the action is lively and vigorous enough to suit anyone.

"The Treacherous Policeman."—A Hepwix, in which an officer is openly charged with treachery in attempting to fasten a crime of one upon another who is the accepted lover of the girl to whom the policeman attempts to pay attention. There is some interest in the working out of the plot, but it seemed to be out of place to charge any policeman with this type of treachery. Technically there is little to criticise, most of the scenes being clear, even where there is considerable brisk movement, but the sentiment upon which the picture is based is scarcely satisfactory and mars the whole performance.

"My Wife's Gone to the Country."—Seldom does one hear such continuous laughter as greeted this film from the New York Motion Picture Company. It is a story of what a mere man attempted to do when his wife departed for the country, and the humorous situations in which he placed himself kept the audience more than pleased. They were laughing loudly all the time and the picture closed amid ringing applause. His attempt to prepare his own breakfast, after wrecking a room in a search for a clean shirt and a lost collar button is funny enough. And the kitchen is a wreck, too, when he gets done with it. And so on through the list. The photography could be improved. It is weak most of the way through, but the fun is so palpable and pleases the average audience so forcibly that the poor photography is overlooked. It is a comic which ought to make a hit everywhere. It is an illustration of the numerous jokes and innuendoes which are made about the man who is left alone in town while his family is away.

"Her Favorite Tune."—A Phoenix film which brings the tears to the eyes at the beginning and ends happily, thus removing the stigma which usually attaches to sentimental pictures of this character. To see a little girl blinded by a toy cannon is not pleasant, yet the accident is admirably managed here. Likewise it is scarcely pleasant to see her grandfather's opera rejected when he apparently needs the proceeds. Then the little girl is stolen, following an accident to her grandfather, and later he is seen wandering from house to house playing her favorite tune upon his violin in an attempt to find her. A wealthy lady hears his story and tells him to bring the little girl to her, which he does shortly after, when he finds her through playing that tune. Then come the pleasant features. The girl's sight is restored, the grandfather's opera is accepted and there is a joyous ending to what began as a gloomy picture. The technical qualities of the picture are satisfactory, excepting in two interiors, where the photography is dim due, probably, to poor lighting. The acting is quite satisfactory. In fact, the Phoenix Company seems to have capable actors. The work of the child is especially to be commended and the acting of the grandfather is better than the average. It is a good film and will add to any programme.

"The Good Shepherd."—A Raleigh & Roberts picture which is short and represents merely a shepherd's work in caring for sheep among the mountains. It has no dramatic attractions, but the scenery is rugged and not unattractive, while the spectacle of climbing steep mountain sides searching for lost sheep and bringing them down is interesting. Photographically there is nothing to criticise.

"The Orphan of Messina."—This picture had no manufacturer's mark, but whoever it is that produced it he made a mistake in some particulars. While the last part is good, the advisability of showing a cemetery may well be questioned. One doesn't like to pay his money for the purpose of attending a funeral, and that is about what the first part of this film amounts to. The last part, where the couple who have buried a child, adopt an orphan in Messina, is good and the gloom which covers the first part like a thick cloud is somewhat dispelled, but it is impossible to overcome the depressing influence of that death bed and the cemetery. It is clearly not what motion pictures are for and it deserves to be relegated to those places where undesirable films are located after being tried on a long suffering public.

"Mr. Jones' Burglar."—A comedy from the Biograph studio in which the ever delightful Jones family give another of their laughable exhibitions. This time Mr. Jones goes out on business and after trimming the crowd at poker goes home to his wife long after the hour set for his coming and about seventeen kinds of trouble are waiting for him just inside the door. Luckily he discovers a frightened burglar and impresses him into a scheme by which Mr. Jones performs a great hero stunt and succeeds in pacifying Mrs. Jones. It would be difficult to conceive of a better acted or funnier series of pictures than the Biograph's Jones combination and this film will add to the already delectable list. The humor is manifest and the action and photography are so good that they help materially in developing the funny subject. Mr. Jones is to be congratulated upon his successful elusion of the watchful Mrs. Jones.

"They Would Elope."—A Biograph comedy which illustrates the difficulties of a young couple who misconstrued the action of the girl's father and decided to elope because he made sport of them. And the trials through which they go in trying to escape from the irate father, who quite contrary to their expectations hasn't the slightest objection to the wedding and invites all the neighbors to assist in decorating the house and providing a worthy celebration when the young couple return looking for forgiveness. But they never go to the minister's, and returned home before any wedding occurred. Luckily there was a minister among the guests and he quickly supplied the deficiency. It was a very woebegone, bedraggled couple that stood up before him, but they were plainly very happy and everybody had a good time. The film is in the Biograph's best vein and technically is even better than their excellent average.

"The Newest Woman."—A Lubin comedy designed to make some of the more progressive women, the extremists, ridiculous, and it succeeds admirably. The action is good and the denouement sufficiently unexpected to add to the picturesque humor of the piece, which is really little more than a skit. But like all the funny things that come from Lubin it is funny and the end is the signal for hearty laughter all through the house. The photography is good, even the difficult interiors being clear and well defined.

"The Drunkard's Child."—A touching drama from Lubin which deserves a long run because of the warm-heartedness which it illustrates and the good will which it generates. The story is simple. A crippled boy is left an orphan by his mother, with a drunken father to worry him, but he is rewarded for his honesty in returning a pocketbook by the friendship of a philanthropic old gentleman who finally adopts him and takes him to his home and heart. The child discovers a burglar entering the house, who proves to be his own father, and is shot by the constable who comes on the child's report to arrest him. There is lively action, which seems perfectly natural, and there is plenty of good sentiment to make the drama interesting. The staging is satisfactory. The acting is easy and without artificial movements and the photographic quality is quite satisfactory. It is an excellent picture, without being great, and will please. The protection of a crippled child will appeal very strongly to a large number of people, no matter what their station in life.

"A Woman's Way."—An interesting little drama from the Vitagraph studio which illustrates how a woman succeeded in deceiving a young man into falling in love with her, thus fulfilling the terms of his uncle's will, and at the same time securing an excellent wife. It is one of those pictures which appeal because the story is simple and well acted, while the technical quality is sufficiently good to support the other qualities. The picture is active enough to hold the interest and is happy enough not to cover the screen with gloom and clouds.

"The Two Pigeons."—A Pathe film which illustrates again the folly of a girl who left a true lover in her country home to follow a man who displayed his riches who, when he tired of her, sought another. She goes back to her former love, is accepted by him, the past is forgotten and they are supposed to live happily ever afterward. The photographic quality of the film is good, like all Pathes', while the story is familiar and simple enough to be interesting. The ending is different, in that the young woman is not indignantly spurned when she returns. This adds to the interest and gives the picture a happy ending.

"Arabian Pilgrimage."—A Pathe production of the Arabian pilgrimage to Mecca. It is clearly photographed and gives a good idea of the pilgrims and their march to the shrine of their patron saint. For this reason it possesses much educational value and is interesting to the general audience, as all films depicting little known scenes and life are interesting.

"Baby Is King."—An excellently photographed and acted Urban picture designed to emphasize what everybody already knows about the tyranny of King Baby. This one gets everything he wants, which is better than most babies do, and finally condescends to go to sleep. It is a neat picture and well worth seeing Pictures of this type are always attractive. Children are always pleasing and the smaller and more tyrannical they are the better the audience likes the picture. A good many live over their own experiences in watching such a film on the screen.

"The Hidden Treasure."—An Urban which varies an attempt at suicide by allowing the young man to hang himself from a rafter, which breaks and a hidden hoard of money is thereby disclosed. Then the parents of the girl he wanted to marry think he is quite the proper bridegroom and a wedding follows instead of a funeral. The audience can think themselves fortunate, since many funerals have been offered them during the past three months on the motion picture screens of the country, and to escape one is indeed a relief.

THE LECTURES.

Considerable improvement has been noted in the lectures the past week, the only objection being the tendency to divide one long lecture into six parts. One was on the immigration to the United Staates and was excellent in every respect. Several of the parts were liberally applauded, as the lecture closed, an unusual demonstration for a lecture.

The slides for the lectures are technically better than they used to be, but in not all instances do they adequately illustrate the text. Perhaps this is a minor fault as long as they do not conflict with it and are reproductions of the scenery of the country or city described.

"Paul Revere's Ride" was given one day with numerous excellent slides, and this week one house has been running a lecture on Norway which is unusually well illustrated. Slide makers are doing better work all the time and the slides offered now are technically much better than ever before.

THE 101 RANCH—WILD WEST.

Here is a motion picture, or a series of motion pictures, which have the flavor of the typical Wild West. Here are Indians, cowboys, wild steers and a bull fight. Surely this is excitement enough for one number.

The illustrations open with a series of good slides, depicting various scenes upon the ranch above mentioned, which is said to be located in Oklahoma. But of course it could be located anywhere else if desired. The pictures are much the same all over that interesting region.

Then comes a eulogistic talk about William Pickett, who went down to Mexico City and before 25,000 hostile Mexicans beat out their favorite infuriated bull with only his hands to fight him with. This Pickett is said to be a plain American cowboy and his desperate battle was merely for life, while the bull, a real Spanish infuriated beast, had his reputation to maintain. Consequently it looked as though the cowboy would get the worst of the encounter.

Before the infuriated bull was turned loose in the arena there were numerous stunts by the visiting cowboys, all of which are more or less familiar to those who have seen motion pictures. Everybody was impatient to see Pickett and the bull have it out. At last, after a stage coach was held up, it was announced that the bull and Pickett were about to have it. And they did. Here is a motion picture of the contest which is well worth while seeing. It is exciting enough and there is tense interest while it is going on. The picture is good, too, even though the movements of the bull and his clinging opponent are rather sudden in spots. And finally the infuriated Spanish bull is permitted to save his face by the rescue of Pickett from his perilous position. The whole 25,000 cheered the bull for his escape from the clutches of such a monster as the American cowboy, but no one had a word of commendation for Pickett. It is clearly true that the sympathies of the Mexicans in that instance, at least, were with their favorite infuriated bull. It is hoped that this will not be made an international incident. The bull may well walk out of the arena with his head and tail held high. He was extremely fortunate to escape without having both amputated.

The technical qualities of these pictures might be better, but perhaps the conditions under which they are taken accounts for the dimness in some of them. They illustrate types and incidents which are fast becoming history and for that have an educational value.

CHICAGO TO THE FORE.

It is optimism, optimism, optimism all the time, in the great Western city of Chicago. There, according to our recent experience, they neither talk bad times nor think bad times. They do not think depression. Frankly, we do not think they know the meaning of the word. During our all too short visit, we were conversing with a friend there about dietetics and cognate subjects. We incidentally inquired of him whether he ever suffered from indigestion? His reply was short and to the point: "Haven't time to think of it."

In the recent spell of hot weather some of the smaller moving picture houses, in outlying sections of Chicago, closed down, but in the busier parts of the city all the houses were in full blast, and there seemed little evidence of Summer slackening. The talk was all of an early resumption of full activity, and the outlook for the Fall and Winter is a prosperous one. By the time that this copy of the World is being circulated out West things will be on the hum again.

New theaters on a grandiose scale are being opened up in the city, and it is the evident intention of Chicago to take the lead in magnificence of structure. The tendency is towards specialization. The time has gone by when any old shack or store would be considered good enough for a moving picture house. Chicago, therefore, has a perfect grip of the situation and modern requirements.

We heard the same story of progress and enterprise, in some of the smaller cities, such as Beloit, Madison, (Wis.), and Milwaukee. The moving picture theater in these and other cities of this section of the West has so firmly established itself in popular favor that its possibilities and prospects are discussed amongst people at large with an interest equal to if not exceeding that of the regular stage.

We felt some personal gratification at the fact that, whereever we went, and no matter upon whom we called, the familiar pink cover of The Moving Picture World was always in evidence. No other publication of the kind seems to enter into the scheme of things out West. For instance, the first person whom we struck on the train going west from Chicago was a highly intelligent moving picture operator, whom we soon discovered to be a careful student of Mr. Richardson's articles. Again, in the capital city of Madison, Wis., the stories of the films, which we publish week by week, are read with as much avidity as a serial novel. So it goes all along the line.

We had a long and interesting talk with Mr. Jos. Hopp, of the Western Film Exchange of Chicago whose outlook is bright and progressive. Even in the torrid weather of mid-August, there were signs of high pressure work in this exchange. It really seems as if Chicago not only has no time to think of indigestion, but also none to devote to leisure or such frivolities as vacations.

Activity also reigned round about the Chicago Film Exchange, which has recently opened a branch in New York City. This company features the Phoenix films, to the good qualities of which we are early making special reference.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Next week the "Lost Letter" will be shipped, as advertised, on August 18. It is a fine film story, and is sure to increase the present splendid demand for Centaur film.

THE CARE OF THE REEL.

Minneapolis, Minn., August 19, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—August 7 edition of your publication has just arrived, and as usual I have read same carefully, and I wish to reply to your editorial under the heading "Suggested Improvement for Reels." The complaint that Mr. Richard P. Grieve has made as to the condition of the film at the beginning and end is one thing that I have had to contend with and worried a great deal over. We have been constantly working on a remedy for this trouble, but as yet I cannot say that we have made any great progress. For the life of me I cannot figure out how the enlargement of the hub of the reel will give you any better results. I firmly believe that Mr. Grieve has been dealing with the strict reel system. This we discarded months ago, and now in place of leaving subjects on the reel continually, we split them and change them about; thus the subject that goes out to-day first on the reel will, when it is returned and sent out again, be in the middle of the reel. This sort of evens the proposition up, and I find that it is helping the cause a great deal. Besides this, if a long strip of leader is left on the reel at the beginning and end, I believe it will give just as good results as if you used a large axle for the reel.

I am not at all enthused over the suggestion of the possibility of the 12-inch reels becoming a standard size. It would mean that a great many exhibitors would be compelled to purchase new magazines besides rewinds and take-ups, etc.

Please consider the above suggestion and address Mr. Grieve and ask him to try changing his subjects around for awhile, and using good long leaders on his film, and I believe that he will find some remedy for his worries.

Trusting the above will meet with your consideration, I remain,

Cordially yours,
JAMES V. BRYSON,
The Laemmle Film Service.

WITH HER CARD.—A story of a woman scorned. The more we love the nearer we are to hate, and there is no hate as bitter as that of a woman scorned. Treat a woman with indifference and she will cling to you, but scorn her and you have aroused a serpent more venomous than the adder. Randolph Churchill, a Wall street broker, incurred the love of Adele Alletta, a comic opera favorite, and although he treated her with almost cruel sang-froid, she rejected all other suitors in his favor, among whom was Henry Larkin, another broker, who sincerely loved her. Adele, however, was simply a whim with Churchill, and he coldly threw her aside to marry a society belle. This information comes to her in a letter from him, and also announcement of his engagement in the newspapers. He did not know the designing powers of the seemingly light-hearted, frivolous girl, who at once evolved a scheme he little dreamed her capable of. Appreciating the strength and sincerity of Larkin's love for her, he having sought her in marriage most ardently, she writes him of the humiliating insult she suffered from Churchill, begs that he effect his ruin in the market, promising to marry him the day he accomplishes it. Larkin is most willing to undertake the affair, as he had undergone many a heartache on account of his rival and as Churchill's holdings are in open market, he figures the undertaking fairly easy, and feels positive of success. At last the fight is on, the tickers relentlessly and industriously record the diverging currents of fortune—Larkin, upward; Churchill, downward, until at the end of the first day a little short of panic hangs over the office of Churchill. The game, however, is to be to the bitter end, and the next day opens ominous for the victim. He is at a loss to know who is his opponent, and fate leads him to the office of Larkin for help, where he learns the truth of the situation. In desperation he returns to his own office to find the last prop broken and his fortune swept away. His fiancee, the society belle, learns of his ruin, cruelly deserts him, as do all of his so-called friends. Larkin loses no time in informing Adele of the result of the scheme and she comes to the office, where, realizing the extreme woe of Churchill, persuades Larkin to send him back his holdings with her card attached, on which is written, "The game won, spoils returned with compliments of Adele Alletta." These arrive at Churchill's office very timely, for in his desperation he was about to terminate his existence. Adele is true to promise with Larkin, and accepts the situation with felicity, as during the episode her eyes are opened and she sees Larkin's real worth and loves him. Churchill, on the other hand, bows to the inevitable with more than becoming grace as the return of his fortune is the all-important.

HIS WIFE'S VISITOR.—After the exciting elopement of some time ago, Harry and Bessie are now enjoying the seraphic bliss of a conjugal existence in a cosy little Harlem flat. Harry Wright seems to live only to please his wife, Bessie, as up to now they have been inseparable. The boys at the club, however, miss Harry's society very much, for he was always the life of their little parties and so plan to inveigle him to a sociable game of draw poker. Jack Wallace is appointed a committee of one to do the persuasion act, and calling at the home finds Harry quite in the humor. Bessie, though, is much perturbed at his departure, and makes no attempt to disguise her displeasure. Harry, however, goes, promising not to be late. But promises are forgotten in the fascination of a poker game, especially when things are more than moderately coming his way. Eleven, twelve, one is indicated by that chronometrical reminder, the clock, and Bessie is nearly beside herself with rage. "Ah! a scheme. I'll cure him of future peregrinations. I'll make him jealous." So she arranges things to make it appear that she has had a visitor, and a male visitor at that. Placing two chairs side by side at the table, she pours a drop of wine in each of two glasses, placing a cigar alongside. Fine. Oh, but there must be the odor of tobacco smoke. To effect this she, after some difficulty, lights and puffs a few times the weed. Now all is ready to arouse the demon jealousy in the heart of Harry. Two o'clock, Harry, carrying a small size hun, arrives. Bessie has gone into the inner room to await developments. What sounds are those she hears? "Aha! Traitoress, murder, suicide, vengeance," and like ejaculations are emitted, and Harry bursts into the room armed with a shot gun. A fatility would have occurred had not Bessie picked up some baby clothes and pretended to have been working on them. Explanations follow, which make Harry realize what a brute he has been and peace reigns with a promise from Harry to be a good

MRS. JONES' LOVER: Or, I Want My Hat.—We are all cognizant of the fact that our friend Jones is of a jealous disposition, for the little episode at the rehearsal of the Amateur Dramatic Club is still fresh in our minds, but Jones in vindication claims there is no true love without jealousy. Well, here is another incident where the verdure-eyed makes its appearance. A lady friend of Emma calls and leaves a very pretty bouquet of roses, and when Eddie arrives he wants to know where they came from. Mrs. J., incensed at his insinuating question, refuses to enlighten him. Her actions seem convincing, which situation is intensified by the finding of a strange hat in the hallway. As furious as an Othello he rushes about the house, with a sword in hand, to annihilate the perfidious traducer of his home. Mrs. Jones is now alarmed and would have explained if she could, but she was unable to account for the hat or the owner, who is subsequently found. The maid, however, holds the key to the mystery. She had broken a handsome vase and secretly brought in this workman to repair it. Hence the tragedy did not occur.

WONDERS OF NATURE IN THE TWIN FALLS COUNTRY, SOUTHERN IDAHO.—In offering this remarkable scenic picture of one of the most majestic and awe-inspiring water phenomena of all the West, we would emphasize strongly the fact that this subject is not an ordinary scenic picture, but an extraordinary feature picture, which, in point of everything, has never been surpassed. This picture will not merely compel the interest of your audiences, but will hold them spellbound from the first foot of the film to the last.

The Twin Falls country, in southern Idaho, is remarkable for its scenic beauty. Out of the beaten paths of tourist travel, the natural beauty is conserved, and Mother Nature, unaltered by human hands, runs riot in gorgeous coloring of green vale, blue lakes and rivers, and virgin whiteness of her snowcapped mountains. The great Snake River, winding like a blue ribbon through fertile green valleys, rises in the mountains of the picturesque Yellowstone. A rushing torrent until it reaches the Snake River basin, it rolls tumultuously through canyon walls, its course broken by a number of great falls, the greater of these being the famous Shoshone Falls and Twin Falls.

Twin Falls is 184 feet high, 24 feet higher than Niagara. It derives the name from the two falls, almost identical in formation and size, and separated by a gigantic rock, creating the picturesque result shown in the photograph. The falls are between high canyon walls and to reach them one must follow a perilous path for three-quarters of a mile through the blind canyon.

Shoshone Falls is even greater in size than Twin Falls. It makes a leap of 212 feet from the crest to the surface below.

Other important features of this picture are the famous Perrine Cascade, Thousand Springs, Great Snowbank Spring, and other points of interest.

Perrine Cascade makes a leap of more than 900 feet, creating a most spectacular and picturesque effect. A wagon trail, following the canyon, winds under the falls, and one in passing has on one side the canyon wall and on the other the crashing waters of the Perrine.

Thousand Springs derive their name from the great numbers of separate springs which spring out of the mountain side, falling several hundred feet to the valley below.

The Great Snowbank Spring is the largest spring in the world, bubbling up from the earth on the mountain side from an outlet some 25 feet in diameter.

Photographically, this picture is superb. Our camera man, who visited these scenes in the early Summer, risked life and limb in obtaining some of the views shown in this film, and the results are better than we can explain. From an artistic point of view the film cannot be excelled. Approximate length, 1,000 feet.

DUST IN HIS EYE.—A gentleman on his way home, as he passes a maid cleaning a rug before her door, has the ill-fortune to catch a particle of dust in his eye. The maid assists him in an attempt to remove it, but they fail to succeed.

His vain efforts to secure relief from the pain occasioned by the mote form the material for some very interesting comedy as he pleads with every passerby to help him and they all fail.

He interrupts two sweethearts in their little chat. He requests a man who is smoking to "blow the dust from his eye." This party, bothered by the request, fills the pained organ with smoke. When two policemen, of whom he requests aid, attempt to assist, they blow one another to the ground. Bystanders in a public park next try to help. Here a crowd soon collects, while cyclists and automobilists use their pumps to no purpose.

His next plea is made to an athlete of huge proportions, who blows with such force that the poor sufferer is driven back some yards. This portion of the comedy uses trick photography to great advantage in showing his backward rush and rapid return to the strong man.

On his arrival home his wife tries to remove the obstacle by use of the fire bellows. Sue fails. Then his little boy, who is a very clever child actor, with little effort blows the dust from his father's eye. Length, 400 feet.

RETALIATION.—A short rural play extolling the care of the aged. Particularly clear in its plot and beautiful in costuming and scenery.

The picture shows first the home of a laborer and his family, which consists of his wife, his young son and his old father, who is palsied by age. As they sit at their meal the old man drops a plate from his shaking fingers. The plate is broken on the ground, much to the annoyance of the younger man, who goes from the table in a rage to return shortly with a wooden plate which we see him secure from the dog's kennel. This he gives to the old man, telling him that plate will not break. The old man is heartbroken, as is also the grandson.

We next find the youngster at work with a block of wood in the yard of the home. As his father, who is very fond of him, passes and notices the boy hard at work, he pauses to inquire what is being made. The little fellow says, "I am making a wooden plate to give to you when you are old." The father is so impressed with the justice of the boy's idea, and by the pathos of what he has done, that with his wife and the child he immediately seeks the old man and asks his forgiveness. Length, 214 feet.

CYCLIST'S HORN.—This picture depicts the adventures of a cyclist, who, after colliding with an officer of the law, is warned to obtain a horn or bell for use upon his machine. He secures the largest horn possible—one possessed of marvelous power to move all things that come before it.

Attaching the new signal to his machine, he continues on his way. The officer who warned him against riding without a means of awakening people, is the first person he meets. When almost upon the unsuspecting man he blows the powerful horn, throwing him to the ground. He then increases his speed to evade the incensed policeman, who attempts his arrest. In the headlong flight, the horn stands in good stead, for by means of its power all obstacles are removed from his path. Pedestrians, brother cyclists, barriers such as gates and stone walls, all are removed.

A ride on bicycles through a deep forest and along a wild hillside forms a strictly new departure in exciting scenes. After this wild ride the horn aids him further by removing other barriers and finally makes it possible for him to hold at bay the officer and a crowd of followers, as each attempt they make to capture him is met by an awful blast from the horn, which tumbles them in a heap.

Finally, an exceptionally strong effort breaks the horn and the cyclist falls into the hands of the mob. Very interesting, as are all trick pictures, and of unusual merit from the photographer's standpoint. Length, 347 feet.

LAURELS.—Framed in a wreath of roses we see a lithe Greek dancer, who sways and postures before an epicurean party of ancients, followed by a laurel wreath and encircling a scene showing school children of 1830 receiving their marks of diligence at a distribution of rewards; then the wreath of bay tendered by the Roman Senators to Caesar on the culmination of his career; now a beggar receives a loaf called a "crown" from a charitable passerby; Christ is shown crowned with thorns by the rabble; following the divine drama we see the old comedian's wreath presented him at a performance.

The next view shows the Emperor Charlemagne crowning his son Lewis. The film closes with the wreath of orange blossoms encircling a bridal party. Length, 447 feet.

A LONG REACH.—The policeman, who heads the bill in this comedy, is the proud possessor of an automatic arm which extends itself to apparently any distance. It proves most valuable as a thief catcher, but is exceptionally useful in other ways.

When the officer's duties require him to remain at a certain point and he wishes to guide inquirers to other places, he merely extends his arm so that it shows the way. People on upper floors in flat buildings are as readily reached as if they were upon the ground. To accommodate the public he occasionally uses the arm as a bridge across small streams.

The feature portion of this picture shows the long-armed policeman in pursuit of a thug. The chase up the side of a building and subsequent search of the rooms by extending the arm through the chimneys is intensely interesting as well as very laughable.

The marvelous arm makes several captures of wrong parties before the actual culprit is found hidden under the furniture in an apartment. The arm and hand alone searching cabinets, walls and furniture makes a very mysterious production. Length, 500 feet.

THE LITTLE DRUMMER OF 1792.—The first scene is that of a French hamlet at a time when the country is in great turmoil and danger, because of the invasion by the Prussians and Austrians. The hurrying to and fro of many frightened and excited natives places us in the very atmosphere of war.

Now, through the streets of the village, come the soldiers, marching past cheering throngs of people. Next, a herald appears, reading to the assembled crowd a call for volunteers. Most of the men follow him to the recruiting office, where the officials are very busily engaged in enrolling many patriotic men. Among those wishing to go out into battle for their country is a peasant, who is refused because of his age. Sadly, the old man turns to leave, when his son, a lad of fourteen years, begs permission to go in his stead. Hilariously, the officers inquire what he can do and for answer he points to the company drum, lying upon the barracks floor. He is accepted as a drummer boy and in the next view we are in the midst of war and our little hero is seen upon the battle field with his pet dog, which has followed him through many interesting experiences since the day of enlistment.

Our youthful soldier is calmly obeying the orders of the officers, playing calls for charge and recall with the air of a veteran as the battle rages back and forth across the field.

His courage is noted by both the men and the officers. When it becomes necessary to send a message to another detachment, he is chosen for the hazardous duty. Glad of the great honor, he, with his four-footed companion, gayly makes the journey, delivers the message, and starts on the return way. At a turn in the road he falls into an ambuscade, where both he and the dog lose their lives. As the little drummer breathes his last, the French troops arrive and put the enemy to flight. The hero and his dog are buried in the same grave with military honors.

Artistically complete in every detail. Length, 497 feet.

THE COBBLER AND THE MILLIONAIRE.—This subject very amusingly shows the discontent of a poor man when suddenly made the possessor of wealth. The story is well rendered after La Fontaine's fable of like title.

An industrious cobbler, content with his work and his life, lived neighbors to a rich man, who was surfeited with life's pleasures, tired of all things, restless, ofttimes ill and bothered by the noise of the cobbler's work.

Distracted by the continual pegging, the financier finally sends for his neighbor, the workman, and offers him wealth enough to make it unnecessary for him to labor farther, on coudition that he shall refrain absolutely from work.

At first the cobbler is very pleased. He accepts the proffer, hoping to be very happy as a plutocrat. However, he soon finds it hard to keep from his bench and unpleasant to explain to his old customers that he no longer needs to work; moreover, he becomes so nervous for fear of being robbed that he and his wife hear in every sound at night some robber approaching their store of wealth, and, finally spend entire nights in watching the treasure. Ere long the cobbler and his wife decide it is more wise for people to live the life to which they are trained and that wealth does not bring content. They return the gold to their wealthy neighbor, who soon hears the merry sound of the shoemaker's hammer. Unhappily, he orders his man to close the window that the echoes of honest labor may not disturb his rest. Length, 427 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine.)

THE STRIKERS.—The opening scene shows one of the many exceedingly interesting taverns of France, located in the smaller towns. The foreman of the town stone quarries is shown visiting with his sweetheart, the inn keeper's daughter. It is one of the beautiful pictures of rustic lovers which always touch the heart of the public.

From the tavern he goes to the quarry where we see him in charge of his force of men, all of whom seem both busy and contented with the exception of one man who, rather than attend to his duty, moves about among the workmen, sowing thoughts of discontent, telling them that in a very short time the walking delegate of the labor organization will arrive to lead them in a fight for greater concessions from the owner of the quarries.

Next, we see the agitator at the tavern, drinking and making love to the foreman's sweetheart. Being a clever man, gifted with great ability to express himself and strong in his influences over men, he has little trouble to gain the girl's interest.

With the help of the man who had announced his coming, the agitator finally incites the men to strike. In spite of the pleas of the foreman they leave their work to parade the streets in a body, adding to their number such bystanders as they can. They then go to the home of their employer and there make their demands, which are refused. The young foreman heroically attempts to turn them from their purpose, but his words are ever drowned by the dramatic statements of the mob leader.

The love story moves with the action of the mob. The tavern keeper's daughter, admiring the powerful leader, follows him with the crowd and is favored often by words and caresses from him. She now utterly ignores her former lover, who is naturally despondent.

The employer is not forced to surrender by the mere closing of his quarries, and the men are soon in need of money for their families. They become more fierce under the compelling tongue of the agitator. They again make their demands and are refused. Whipped into a frenzy by the unscrupulous leader, they arm themselves and move upon the grounds of their former employer, bent upon destruction and crime. Through all, the young foreman follows and attempts to advise, but is forced aside unnoticed. As well, his former sweetheart attends always upon the mob leader, making life even harder for the man whom she had once called her lover.

The crisis of the drama is strongly enacted within the quarry grounds. The mob, misled by the emotional speeches, and strung to the highest pitch of anger by their fancied grievances, has only begun its course of destruction under the orders of its leader, who with his new found sweetheart, is gloating over the success of his work, when our hero, driven desperate at last by his own failure and the sight of his sweetheart in the embrace of another, rushes through the crowd, separates the rogue from the girl, then challenges the bombastic soldier of fortune to combat. The leader at first tries to frighten him, but realizing the fact that the youth is in deadly earnest, weakens and, being at heart a coward, refuses the encounter. The mob, disgusted by his weakness, slinks away, while the girl who had loved him only for his apparent strength, begs her old-time sweetheart to forgive her. Length, 567 feet.

BUILDING BARRELS.—An excellent and unusual series, clearly reproducing the phases of barrel construction by hand, an industry of Southern France.

In this interesting craft machinery is conspicuously absent, and is apparently unnecessary, judging by the rapidity and ease with which operations are conducted by a small number of workmen.

The entire process of building the barrel in its successive steps, from the securing of the raw stock to the marketing of the finished product. Length, 400 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

SATAN'S SMITHY.—The hard-working old blacksmith is seen in his little shop, toiling; making a living for himself and his good wife. Suddenly there is a transformation scene, and a singular looking person stands before him. The amazed smithy listens to the interesting tales of the stranger, and after a little persuasion the old fellow volunteers to accompany his guest, who turns out to be none other than old Satan. The latter lures his victim into a cave, where, after many narrow escapes from falling into the abyss, they finally arrive in Hades. Old Satan begins at once to make things interesting for his new guest, and with the aid of numerous transformation scenes, the frightened smitby is shown all the inside secrets of the infernal regions.

When the smithy's wife misses him, she at once starts out to find her husband, and coming to the entrance of the cave, she plucks up her courage and enters. Soon she is in the midst of all the fire and brimstone, but when she spies her loved one, she makes a frantic rush to rescue him from the throes of his satanic majesty. Things are beginning to look rather dispairing for the smitby and his wife, when suddenly the good fairy queen appears upon the scene, bringing peace and happiness to the frightened couple, releasing them from bondage, and driving old Satan away. Length, 472 feet.

CHARITY REWARDED.—On a bitter cold day, a poor old tramp comes to a little house in the village, where he asks for food and shelter. Just previous to his arrival the women have read in a local newspaper that the town is besieged by a band of thieves, so thinking that possibly the poor beggar might be one of the gang, they turn him from the door. The disheartened old fellow, nearly dead from hunger and exposure, seats himself beside a wood pile to take a little rest. Soon a little girl, a member of the family who have just refused food to the stranger, comes along on her way from the store, with her arms laden with provisions. The youngster, realizing at a glance the sad plight of the starving man, gives him a hearty meal, which the old fellow ravenously consumes. The child then offers the poor man a place to sleep; so, taking him by the hand, she leads him to a shed where there is a lot of hay, upon which the grateful beggar makes for himself a comfortable bed for the night.

He is not long asleep when he is awakened by the cries of the women in the adjoining house, and realizing that they are in need of aid, the old fellow starts in to investigate. He comes upon three robbers who have broken into the place and are attacking the defenseless women and the child who saved his life through her charitable act.

In an instant the man pounces upon the trio and after throwing two of them to the floor, he is in a strenuous scuffle with the third ruffian, when some neighbors who have heard the noise, rush in, and rescue the hero. The nefarious trio are conquered and taken prisoners, while the women whose lives were saved by the man whom they refused aid, shower blessings upon his head. Taking the little child in his arms, the poor old tramp fondly caresses her and feels that he only did his duty in rewarding the youngster for her charity. Length, 476 feet.

POMPEY'S DREAM.—After many trials and narrow escapes, Mr. Pompey, who has been out celebrating, returns home in an over-happy mood caused from imbiding too freely in the distilled juice of the luscious grape. When he enters his home he meets with a strenuous tirade from his wife for his unbecoming conduct. Disgusted, the woman leaves the room, after which Pompey throws himself upon the bed and is soon in slumberland.

In the next picture we get a view of his inner thoughts, for his dreams, which are a droll conglomeration of events, are shown upon the screen in an amusing fashion. He imagines that he is lifted bodily out of bed and dragged up through space into heaven. Arriving at the golden gate, he is confronted by Peter, who admits him within the portals of the glittering paradise, where everything coincides with Pompey's ideas of what a paradise should be. His first trip in the home of bliss is down to the wine cellars, where, thinking that he will be in his glory, he starts elucidating his favorite brand. It proves to be a little more difficult than he anticipated, for he is informed that he must show his true value as a good worker before he will be allowed to taste of the private stock. Pompey agrees to do whatever is required, so old Peter gives him a job keeping the golden pavement clean. Soon Peter falls asleep and Pompey steals his bundle of keys, one of which admits him to the wine cellar. He is having the time of his life when he is discovered by Peter and some more of the elite, who take him into another room and proceed to give him all the wine that he can hold. They throw him on a table and pour the wine down his throat, and just as one of the party jumps on him, Pompey awakens from his terrible nightmare.

At that juncture his wife enters the room, and is pleased to see Pompey breaking all the loaded wine bottles in the place and taking to water as his future beverage. Length, 525 feet.

THE SACRIFICE.—This very pathetic and artistically acted little drama shows a poor fellow in rags who is nearly famished from hunger, coming to a house where he spies a boy eating a large piece of bread. The poor fellow asks the youngster to share the food with him, and when the selfish boy refuses, the starving man snatches the bread and runs away. The boy calls to his family, who, armed with clubs, start in pursuit of the fleeing stranger. After a long chase they overtake the unfortunate fellow near a little stream, and but for the interference of a young woman who defends the helpless man from his assailants, he might have fared badly. When his pursuers have retreated, the poor beggar accompanies his defender as far as her home, where she leaves him. The brave girl has made such an impression upon the unfortunate fellow that he is reluctant about leaving, so seats himself upon the steps of the house in the vain hope that he might again speak with the kind-hearted girl. Soon the young woman's lover comes along, and takes his fair one for a stroll through the beautiful country, where they make love to one another as they slowly walk along, closely followed by the poor tramp.

Unexpectedly the young couple meet a girl on the road, who also holds a claim on the young man's affections, for he has been making love to her, and when she sees the youth in the company of another woman, the jealous maiden whips out a knife and makes a lunge at her rival. At this juncture the poor tramp jumps between the women and receives the death blow, thus sacrificing his life for his protectoress. Length, 397 feet.

A TRIP TO JUPITER.—The King and his official astronomer are alone in the study viewing the heavenly bodies through the monstrous telescope. They go out on the balcony and the gay old ruler is much absorbed in the phenomenon, and spends some time in studying the stars and planets.

The evening has been well spent with the many mysteries which have made such a deep impression upon the King's mind that they are still with him in his dreams. Upon retiring for the night he has a wonderful nightmare, in which he imagines that he is climbing up a long ladder to the planet Jupiter. He passes all the other planets and receives an official salute from each one in honor of his exalted position upon the earth. Finally arriving at Jupiter, he is admitted to the palace of the King, where he is granted an audience with the high potentate. They become so effusive in their welcome and so strenuous in their mode of entertaining that he wishes to be back on earth once more. Finally, after witnessing all that is to be seen, he expresses a desire to return home, so he is picked up bodily and thrown off of the planet, but luckily for him he grabs the ladder and starts to descend. As he is passing Mercury, someone cuts the ladder, his royal highness is precipitated through the air, where he lands with an awful bump on earth. And then he woke up, only to find himself groveling on the floor of his room. Length, 623 feet.

CIGAR-BUTT PICKERS IN PARIS.—The practice of picking cigar "butts" as a means of making a living seems somewhat dubious, but in this picture are presented some realistic scenes, taken from life in the city of Paris.

In the first picture we see an old fellow past 80 years of age, who hasn't slept in a bed for 35 years, but he lives his happy existence out-of-doors, sleeping in any place where he can find shelter. His means of making a living is by gathering up the "butts" on the thoroughfares, where he is only one among many engaged in the same occupation as a means of earning money. They go about with bags, and gather up the discarded particles of tobacco, after which it is assorted and made in large bundles. They then take their wares to the horticulturist, whom they find a ready buyer, for it is used as a disinfectant in the greenhouses, where it is burnt, the smoke of which kills insects and germs on the plants. Length, 361 feet.

A HEROIC FATHER.—This magnificent picture, which is a masterpiece in the art of colored photography and dramatic intensity, shows Little Frank, who is an exceptionally bright chap and the only child of very wealthy parents, starting out for a stroll through the beautiful country under the careful guidance of his governess. Before going far they are approached by a disheveled old beggar woman, who, after receiving a few coins from the child's hand, turns and follows him a short distance down the road. Going then in another direction, the old woman hurries away up into the mountains, where she joins her numerous companions, who are a band of brigands. Upon hearing from the old woman that the son of a wealthy man is out strolling, they seize the opportunity of kidnapping the little fellow and holding him for a large ransom. The outlaws lose no time in mounting their horses and starting out to apprehend their victim. They meet the child and his companion in a desolate part of the road, and before the latter can make an outcry the little fellow is snatched from her side and carried off into the lonely mountains. The distracted woman hurries to the house, where between sobs she relates the frightful incident to the heartbroken parents.

The daring outlaws send a note to the father of the stolen boy, demanding of him to bring ten thousand dollars ransom for the safe return of his child, and meet the brigands at the cross roads. The father starts out immediately to the meeting place, and true to their word the outlaws are there. Blindfolding the anxious man, they lead him up to their camp, where he is confronted by his little son, and ordered to hand over the money. Catching the gang unawares, the brave fellow grabs up a revolver which is lying on a table, and after firing into the midst of his captors, he picks up his little son and makes a bolt for liberty. The outlaws start in pursuit of the fleeing man, but mounting one of their horses he rides the animal at breakneck speed and keeps a fair distance ahead of the pursuers. Finally, after a long chase through the mountains, the man is forced to dismount and climb over the high cliffs, and his would-be captors are gaining ground, but he keeps up his race for freedom. He is nearly in their clutches, when a hunter who happens to be in the vicinity, realizing at a glance the nature of the exciting chase, fires at the pursuers, wounding several and forcing the rest to retreat. The exhausted man arrives home safely with his loving little son in his arms, and great is the joy of the mother when her little boy is again returned to her. Length, 62 feet.

COLD PLUNGE IN MOSCOW.—That cold water plunges are beneficial to the health is a fact which is unrefutable, but it requires a great amount of nerve force to pluck up the courage to plunge into cold water when the temperature is below zero. In this interesting picture we get a good idea of the force of energy and nerve of a man living in Moscow, Russia, who jumps into the water every day in the year, regardless of the temperature. We see him come down to the river in a sleigh and after the men have cut and removed enough ice to facilitate his task, he removes his clothing and takes his famous dip in the water where the ice is over a foot thick. Length, 246 feet.

ELASTIC TRANSFORMATION.—This is another one of Pathes' famous trick pictures which will prove a great success on account of the wonderful transformations which are so cleverly enacted that they leave the spectators spellbound.

A conjuror appears upon the stage with a large box, out of which he takes several glasses and a decanter. Placing the glasses on the table, he fills them with water, then passing his magic wand over them he causes the features of pretty women to appear within the glasses. Next there is a great transformation scene, in which all the glasses disappear and we are confronted by a bevy of beautiful girls, who dance and cut all sorts of amusing capers. Length, 295 feet.

TWO LOVERS AND A COQUETTE.—A big burly fellow, who is in love with a pretty maiden, receives an anonymous letter, telling him that his fiancee is unfaithful to him. Having his suspicions that the lines speak the truth, he takes his gun and starts for the home of his adored one to apprehend his rival.

In the meantime a dashing youth, who is very much in love with the charming miss, calls upon the latter, and just as he is in the act of telling the pretty coquette of his undying love for her, they are warned by the servant of the approach of the enraged rival. The fun now begins, for, the jealous lover knowing that there is someone in the house who is trifling with his adored one's heart, starts through the place to find his hated rival. The chase continues for a long time through all the rooms in the place, until finally the one seeks shelter in a large box, until his enraged pursuer gets out of the way, when he slips out of the hiding place and makes good his escape. Soon another fellow arrives at the place and is shown into the parlor, where he is supposed to polish the floor. Taking off his shoes he leaves them in the center of the room and goes out to do a job in another part of the house. The jealous lover comes bolting into the room, and when he finds the shoes he is convinced that his fiancee is playing him false. He is just trying to make her explain the presence of the shoes when their owner comes in looking for them, and upon seeing that they belong to the laborer, his jealousy all disappears and, falling on his knees, the fellow begs the maiden's pardon for ever daring to suspect her of being unfaithful. Length, 567 feet.

DOOMED.—The opening scene of this beautifully colored picture reveals the exterior of a simple little home in the mountains, where we see a pair of young lovers seated upon a rock, telling each other of their devotion. The maiden's father appears upon the scene, and after listening to the young man's story, the old fellow gladly gives his consent to their immediate marriage. In the next picture we see the happy wedding party returning from the church, when they are approached by an old beggar, who is none other than Satan in disguise, lurking around to cast his evil influence over the happy lives of the young couple. Not realizing who the beggar is, the happy people offer him alms and pass on to the wedding feast. His Satanic majesty suddenly transforms into a hunter, and goes to join the merry revelers. He is well entertained by the simple people, who think that he is a lonely stranger and he, a jolly fellow, makes himself most convivial. He presents the blushing bride with a few flowers, but after admiring them she casts them to the ground, and is about to enter the house, when Satan, through his hypnotic influence, forces her to again pick them up and place them near her heart.

In the next picture the happy young husband is seen leaving his little home to go on a hunting trip. The young bride is alone in the house, when she is suddenly confronted by the stranger again, who, through his suavity, casts an evil spell over the good woman.

The deceitful hypocrite next meets the young man on the road, and invites the unsuspecting youth to accompany him to the tavern where they might partake of some refreshments. After a few drinks the youth loses all self-control, and is wholly within the power of Satan. The latter presents the young man to a beautiful dancing girl, who enthralls him to such a degree by her winsome ways that he forgets his devotion to his young bride. Having his victim wholly under his power, Satan steals from the place and comes back with the young man's wife. When the latter sees her husband fondly clasped in the arms of the voluptuous siren, she becomes wild with rage, and after denouncing him, she runs away with the deceitful stranger. The young husband suddenly realizing the folly of his conduct, casts his alluring companion to the floor and starts out to find his wife. He overtakes her on the road, and wild with rage, he levels his gun, intending to kill her contemptible companion, but instead of accomplishing his purpose, he shoots his wife, and she falls from the cliff dead, while her escort disappears. Length, 836 feet.

THE YELLOW JACKET MINE.—John Burke and Dick Merton are partners in the Yellow Jacket Mine. Burke is an old miner; Dick, a young man, son of an old comrade of Burke, is the junior member of the firm and much loved by his partner. Carrie, the old miner's only daughter, shares her father's affection for Merton, and in fact her love has grown beyond that of a sister's and her young life is centered in the handsome and sturdy young miner. She has a rival, however, in Bonito Juarez, the pretty and vivacious daughter of old Jose Juarez. Bonito is the belle of the mining camp and has more suitors than she has fingers on her hands.

Dick Merton meets her one night at a dance, and from that time on he forgets the little girl who has loved him since childhood. He becomes so madly infatuated with this Mexican beauty that he neglects his work and spends most of his time basking in the sunshine of Bonito's bright eyes. Day after day he urges her to become his wife, but she is not yet ready to give up her freedom, and besides, she tells him, that he has not yet money enough to support her in the style she craves.

Weeks pass by and yet Dick is no nearer the culmination of his ambition than at the start. Then comes a change in the attitude of Bonito. Dick is nonplussed at her extreme coldness and indifference to his attentions. There is a reason for this. The little coquette has at last met her fate, and is hard hit. Travers, a young mining speculator, arrives in the camp, and meeting Bonito quite by accident, becomes interested in the dashing Mexican senorita and begins paying her attention. Being city bred, his manners and bearing dazzle Bonito, who has heretofore known the rugged and unpolished men of the mountains.

It is not long before Travers learns of Merton's infatuation for the girl, and he at once sets about to put his knowledge of the fact to some practical use. Travers knows of the promising outlook of the Yellow Jacket Mine and wants to get possession of it. He makes the partners a proposition, but they refuse to sell. Then he persuades Bonito to use her wiles against young Merton to entice him into selling his share. On a promise of marriage from Travers, the senorita sets about her task. She tells Merton that if he will sell his share for enough money to insure her a life of ease and luxury she will listen to his entreaties. The poor fellow loses his head at last and sells out to the scheming Travers. Hastening to Bonito's house, he places it all in her hands for safe keeping and goes to inform his old partner of the sale.

On his return he is thunderstruck and stunned to catch his sweetheart in the act of flirting with a handsome young Vaquero, who is also badly smitten with the little senorita. Trembling with rage and jealousy, Merton upbraids the girl and demands back his money, but the cunning and treacherous Bonito brazenly tells him that she has not got it —that he never gave her any money. Gradually the truth of the matter dawns upon the young miner and a realization of the woman's duplicity is forced upon him.

Bonito, in the meantime, has returned the money to Travers, and suspecting as much, Merton rushes away to find the speculator. The two men meet, but Travers denies any knowledge of the money and advises Merton to be careful in his accusations hereafter.

There is nothing left for Merton but an open confession of the whole thing to his old partner. At first old Burke is indignant, but his great heart overcomes his anger and he forgives the foolish boy and promises to stand by him through it all. He proposes to oppose Travers in his claim for the mine, feeling that it was obtained through fraud. Telling Merton to arm himself, they repair to the mine, determined not to give it up without a fight.

In the meantime Bonito is pressing Travers to keep his promise and make her his wife. This Travers does not propose to do, and when she becomes too insistent, he brutally tells her that he was only playing with her affections and that henceforth he is through with her. Little does he dream of the fury of a deceived woman of her type. From love her heart changes to hate, and she determines upon revenge.

Disguising herself in the garb of a young miner, she hastens to the Yellow Jacket Mine to await the arrival of Travers and his party as they come to take possession of the claim. Travers finds the partners awaiting him, and when he attempts to formally seize the property he is met with a decidedly warm reception. He is about to call on the sheriff to arrest the miners, when Bonito springs forward and denounces him as an impostor and swindler, substantiating her assertion by revealing her identity and confessing her part in the nefarious deal. Travers is seized and searched for more evidence, and the package of money he had paid Merton is found on his person. The sheriff refuses to act further in the matter and advises Travers to make himself scarce, which he does.

Bonito thus has her revenge, and Merton's eyes are opened to the fact that little Carrie Burke is, after all, the only girl in the world for him, and that he came near losing a fortune when he bartered, through a foolish infatuation, his share of "The Yellow Jacket Mine."

PRINCESS NICOTINE; Or, THE SMOKE FAIRY.—A novelty portraying the mysterious experience of a gentleman with Princess Nicotine and her fairy companion. The gentleman is found seated at a table, upon which are scattered pipes, tobacco, cigarettes and matches. After a short smoke he leans back, yawns and goes to sleep. Presently the lid of the tobacco box opens and the Princess steps out, followed by the smaller fairy. The latter climbs into the pipe, pulls the tobacco over her, while Princess Nicotine returns to the box. The man awakens, grabs his pipe, tries to light it, but it will not draw. He takes a magnifying glass, looks through it into the pipe; the little fairy peeps up and out of the blue smoke rising all about her, laughs, while the astonished man drops the glass, dumps the tobacco on the table and again examines it through the glass. The little fairy gets up at once and kicks about, throws him a kiss, jumps into the tobacco box, jumps out a moment later, bringing Princess Nicotine with her. Both fairies jump into the box again, close the lid, leaving an arm projecting. The man grabs the member to find, instead of the arm, a large rose. He looks at it a moment, smells of it, and is surprised as smoke puffs out from the center. Bringing his glass, he finds the fairy almost hidden in the leaves, calmly smoking a cigarette and blowing the smoke at him. Thoroughly scared, the man hurries from the room, while the leaves detach themselves from the rose, whirl about for a while, then roll themselves into a cigar. The man returns at this time, lights the cigar and is again mystified as the smoke pours into the neck of a large bottle standing on the table. Looking through the glass, he finds the fairy inside the bottle, mocking him. He breaks the bottle and the fairy is observed standing on a box. She hands him a cigarette, which he lights, then blows the smoke at her. She retaliates by lighting the entire box of matches, then quickly disappears, while the man busies himself in extinguishing the fire. Length, 332 feet.

FOR HER SWEETHEART'S SAKE.—In the Wall Street office of Redmond & Barker, brokers, on Christmas Eve, the former is discovered looking over papers, making calculations, as Barker enters, takes a seat and enters into earnest conversation with his partner. A portrait of Redmond's niece, Mollie, meets Barker's gaze, and he at once asks for her hand in marriage. Redmond appears pleased, gives his consent, then writes a note to the girl to the effect that he will not return until late, sending his clerk, Philip, to deliver it. The clerk reaches the house, which is lavishly decorated for the holidays, and is waiting in the parlor, when Mollie rushes downstairs, startling Philip out of his reverie. She teases him coquettishly, finally taking a position under the mistletoe. The young man is decidedly bashful, so Mollie throws her arm around his neck and kisses him, Philip beating a hasty retreat. Mollie, with a party of girl friends, are awaiting Redmond's return. He finally comes, his partner with him. After salutations, Redmond tells Mollie of Barker's proposal of marriage and of his desire that she accept. Mollie is at first surprised, then indignant, positively refuses, and dashes from the room. Her uncle follows, tries to argue with her, then commands her to obey. He then locks her in a room. She decides to make her escape from the house, and a little later we find her dressed in boy's clothes, carrying a valise, climbing out of the window to freedom. Some days later, in passing her uncle's window, where a card reading

The story of a woman scorned

The more we love, the nearer we are to hate, and there is no hate as bitter as that of a woman scorned. This is the subject treated in the Biograph latest issue. A young comic opera favorite is attended by two suitors, one an honest, sincere young man, who wants to marry her, and the other an indifferent, blase fellow, who merely considers her with many others of his whims. However, with woman's peculiar nature, she deeply loves the latter, and when he coldly throws her over for a society belle, that love turns to violent hatred. She will stop at nothing to avenge the insult, so both suitors being stock brokers, she enlists the sincere lover's services to ruin the jilt, promising to marry him the day it is accomplished. As the rival's holdings are in open market, the scheme is easy, and success crowns his efforts. Although she is revengeful, she is not heartless, and sends him back the spoils of the game with her compliments, keeping her promise with the other, whom she now sees in a different light, and loves.

THE LOST LETTER.—A pathetic Western drama. Sam and Jim are two miners living in a shack near their claim in Nevada. Jim is dying of consumption. Sam, his big-hearted partner, tells him, "I will bring a doctor to help you, Jim, if it takes every ounce of gold we have." Sam takes their bag of gold nuggets and goes for the only doctor within fifty miles.

Several hours pass. Racked by pain, Jim is about to kill himself when he notices the name of his partner, Sam Lewis, is carved on the handle of the dagger. To prevent suspicion falling upon his chum, Jim writes a note as follows: "Dear Sam—I'm done for, I can't stand the pain, so I'm going to end it with your knife. Keep my share of the gold. Good-bye, old pal. Jim." Jim places the note on the table and the poor fellow stabs himself.

A strong wind blows the door open and sends the letter flying across the room into a corner.

The discovery of the dead body of Jim, with Sam's dagger covered with blood near him, and Sam gone leads the sheriff and miners to quickly agree on the verdict, "Murdered by his pal, Sam Lewis."

The sheriff overtakes Sam, searches him and finds the bag of nuggets. Sam protests his innocence but the sheriff answers, "We will hang you for this murder." A terrific fight between the men follows. Sam gets the sheriff's revolver and escapes. The sheriff again overtakes Sam and in the struggle that follows, Sam falls over the edge of a precipice. The plucky sheriff lets himself down with a rope to the bottom of the ravine, finds Sam stunned by his fall, captures him and takes him back to camp. The miners immediately lead Sam off to lynch him.

But Fate works in strange ways. A half drunken miner, looking for a stopper for his whiskey flask, picks up the lost letter that Jim wrote exonerating Sam.

The man dashes after the lynching party and overtakes them with the letter just as the lynchers are about to send Sam into Eternity. The sheriff reads Jim's last letter to the crowd and Sam is released and cheered.

Our last scene shows the grave of Jim. A rough board states that he was murdered by his pal, Sam Lewis. The sheriff escorting Sam and followed by all the men in the mining camp, orders the board to be removed and a handsome new board does justice to "A True Pal." The miners leave Sam with his dead comrade. The simple, great-hearted fellow bursts into tears and falls on the grave of his chum.

The acting in this picture, we believe to be the finest ever photographed on a film. The scenic effects and photography are magnificent. Length, 965 feet.

PEACEFUL JONES.—Jones is a poor young Eastern lawyer, who drifts into a one-horse town in Arizona. His amiable, easy going way wins for him the love of Nell, the pretty daughter of the hotel keeper. Jones also gains the enmity of the many cowboy admirers of the girl. One of these, "Ugly Bill," bullies Jones and strikes him with a whip in the presence of Nell, who denounces Jones as a coward. The cowboys wait on Jones and invite him to a duel with "Ugly Bill." Jones refuses and the cowboys "ride him out of town on a rail."

A band of maraunding Indians attack the cowboys, and a fierce battle follows. Jones volunteers to risk his life in an attempt to break through the Indians and get assistance. After two fierce hand-to-hand fights with the savages, Jones meets a company of soldiers and brings them back to the scene of the fight just as the Indians are making a final rush on the cowboys. Having done his duty, Jones quietly remarks, "Boys! I guess I've been hit," and falls upon the ground.

A month later Jones recovers from his wounds, is given a reception by the boys. "Ugly Bill" makes a speech eulogizing Jones, and then brings Nell and "Peaceful" together.

This picture is full of thrilling action that makes the people out in front want to stand up and shout.

HALF BREED'S TREACHERY. The New York Motion Picture Company has been successful in securing for the principal characters of this story a genuine Indian and his wife.

A true Western atmosphere is depicted throughout. Mail has just arrived at the Wild Cat Inn, which the proprietor distributes among the men. He opens a letter announcing the arrival of Col. Langdon and his daughter from New York. This good news is received with great excitement, and orders are given to prepare the best room for the guests. After their arrival much attention is paid Stella, the daughter, by all the boys and the half breed. When the colonel expresses a desire that she learn to ride they all offer their services, so he arranges that they draw for the honor. Hank, a stalwart chap, wins and all show their jealousy, particularly the half breed. They return from a ride and Stella finds the half breed's squaw crying, so she denounces him for his treatment of the woman. During a game of cards, the half breed, who, because of a quarrel with Hank, is seeking revenge, steals the colonel's purse and drops it in Hank's boot. This the squaw has seen done. When the colonel makes known the fact that he has been robbed, Hank is assigned to search all, which he does without success. He in turn is then searched and the purse is found. Despite the fact that he proclaims his innocence, it is decreed that he leave the town. Before departing Hank writes a note, which he asks the squaw to deliver to Stella. While on her mission she is met by the half breed, who takes and reads the note. In anger she reveals that she saw the purse episode and is bound by the half breed, so she can go no further. He delivers the note to Stella, after having changed the meeting place, and is on hand when she supposedly comes to meet Hank. With the aid of the half breed's friends they tie her on a horse and gallop off. As they pass where the Indian girl has succeeded in freeing herself, she draws a pistol and fires, leaving a riderless horse, which she mounts and starts off to notify Hank and others at the tavern. Hank rescues Stella and when the squaw arrives with the others his innocence is made known. The half breed's life is spared to the squaw because of her bravery.

This Bison production far surpasses "A True Indian's Heart" and other feature films recently turned out by this company. Length, 1,000 feet.

GREAT NORTHERN FILM CO.

THE SPY.—Lieutenant Duval does not shun any means to procure money, not even treason. He acquires some very important papers, which he disposes of to an agent of a foreign country. For the money thus obtained he intends to go abroad, and he makes his sweetheart, Miss B., who is cowed and unhappy, promise to go with him.

Another officer, Mr. Jombert, who loves Miss B., discovers the treason, catches Duval in a new theft and has him arrested.

As Miss B. learns of this, she decides to save him from prison and then to take leave forever of the man whom she now absolutely despises.

The treasoner's escape is soon discovered, however, and Jombert, following him on horseback, soon overtakes him and they have a mortal encounter, with the result that Duval is slain.

Jombert goes back to tell Miss B. about the death of her former sweetheart, and after the first shock is over she feels a great relief in being free, and Jombert declares his love, which she accepts and returns.

This picture is realistically enacted, and is bound to hold the interest of every audience from start to finish.

The Outlook for the Fall.

From all quarters, from all sources of the trade, come cheering assurances as to the business outlook. We have made a point, during the past few weeks, in the interests of our readers and the trade in general, of putting a number of inquiries as to the immediate outlook, and the result in general is such as to convince us that the opening Fall will see the moving picture industry in all its divisions working at high pressure.

The manufacturers assure us that they were never so busy; the established exchanges have equipped themselves for the handling of a great quantity of goods, whilst in various other directions there are indications of a spirit of enterprise for meeting the great demand certain to arise during the new era of prosperity, and on which the country has just entered.

We have paid special attention to the exhibiting end of matters, and have got into personal communication with all classes of exhibitors in many large American cities from coast to coast. The response to our questions has been singularly identical in tenor. The past Summer has not been so profitable as it might have been; exhibitors have been "marking" time, content in some cases to make only a small profit, in others just to pay expenses, in others to run at an absolute loss. Back of all this state of affairs, however, lies the profound feeling, amounting to a conviction, that there should be such an early return to normal prosperity that the moving picture business is certain to receive its share of the profit that will be distributed.

More important still, however, is the attitude of the public towards the moving picture, which we find upon diligent and systematic inquiry to be even more favorable than it ever has been. With the public, in fact, the moving picture is now a settled form of entertainment, increasing in favor by leaps and bounds and forming, as it were, one of the staple commodities of life. We cannot possibly discern the slightest evidence of the least falling off in public interest in the moving picture.

It will be seen, therefore, that all the factors for the Fall outlook are about as favorable as they could be. We have no doubt that as the weeks progress we shall all be in the thick of it once more, and the bad old days of 1908 and the early part of 1909 be soon forgotten. In short, the moving picture industry was never in a healthier state, and lest there be any amongst our readers who are at all timorous of the outlook, we hope that this careful survey of the situation will reassure them.

Pennsylvania Exhibitors, Rally!

The exhibitors of Pennsylvania are proceeding with uncertain steps in their efforts to repeal or modify the "aisle law." Mr. Otto Miller, of Chester, Pa., wasted no time parleying with inspectors, but took the bull by the horns and went to Harrisburg with a plan of his theater and obtained from the Chief Factory Inspector a permit to re-open and operate his Biograph theater. Many of the Pennsylvania exhibitors have benefited by the prompt and energetic work of Mr. Miller, as the permit issued to him acted as a precedent. This does not mean that efforts should be relaxed, but rather that the exhibitors should all act in unison. Mr. Miller, who called at the office of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD last week, expressed himself as being very much dissatisfied with the weak response to the call issued to all Pennsylvania exhibitors to meet at Philadelphia and form a State association. Such a linking together of the exhibitors and exchanges throughout the State is most desirable and would certainly have a powerful influence with the legislators, but unless the movement receives unanimous support it is valueless. Meanwhile it is rumored that the forces behind the passage of that outrageous bill are dissatisfied with the lukewarm manner in which the Chief Factory Inspector has enforced the law and that they will ask for his resignation.

While the majority of the exhibitors have been only talking, others have been acting. The Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company engaged competent lawyers to fight the case and sent out a call to the exhibitors asking them to help defray the expenses. If every exhibitor in the State had contributed $10 it would not have been too much money, and they offered to return pro rata to each exhibitor all money not expended for this purpose. As shown in our issue of August 14, very slight response met the appeal. Are the exhibitors so foolish as to wait until their places are closed by the inspector just as the Fall business commences? They should follow the example of Mr. Bennethum, a prominent exhibitor of Reading, who sent his check to the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company and informed them that he was ready to send another check should they call upon him for more help. Mr. Bennethum is a shrewd business man and realized the value of the action commenced by such a substantial concern as the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company and also that it was the duty of the exhibitors to bear a proportionate share of the expense. It has been suggested that the Motion Picture Patents Company be asked to support the work by relinquishing to the exchanges the Pennsylvania show licenses for two weeks, and we have no doubt that they would if it could be shown that the exhibitors and exchanges were all unanimous in their efforts. If the exhibitors all contribute their mite to help win this action, which has been started in their behalf, and if the action is successful, it will go far towards getting them in a frame of mind to unanimously co-operate in the establishing of a strong State association.

☞ "Plain Talks to Operators and Managers" will be resumed next week.

The March of Progress.

We have seldom read with more pleasure any moving picture publication than the recently issued first number of the "Edison Kinetogram," to which we gave brief reference on its first appearance. Primarily this is a bi-monthly bulletin of moving picture news for circulation amongst exchanges and exhibitors, but it contains matter which we think will be of general interest. There is a word from Mr. Edison himself, and an article from Frank L. Dyer, the Vice-President of the company, in which Mr. Dyer manifests his well-known business breadth of view. His concluding words are: "We continue to welcome any and all criticism by which the quality of our pictures may be improved." It is refreshing to read such an intelligent appreciation of the true function of criticism from a man in Mr. Dyer's authoritative position.

From other parts of the "Kinetogram" we gather indications of the very progressive policy which the Edison Company are adopting. We read with pleasure "the movement begun in France, to employ well-known writers and actors, is bound to spread to this country, and we have already anticipated it." We take some pride in the fact that such a renowned association as the Edison Company are, consciously or unconsciously, we know not which, putting into practice a policy repeatedly advocated in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. Such a policy will, we hope, be imitated elsewhere. The company have contracted with well-known authors to write exclusively for them, so that the day of hack subjects with the Edison Company is no doubt past.

Then we are equally glad to see that an actress of the eminence of Miss Cecil Spooner has recently been added to the Edison staff. The "Kinetogram" says: "We hope to employ others as well known in the near future, and meantime we are building up our own force with care and discrimination. The day of extravagant gesturing has passed—that of quiet, tense action and meaning conveyed by facial expression has come. Even in minor parts none but capable actors will be employed. No favoritism will be shown, no likes and dislikes will be considered. 'Can this man or woman intelligently portray this part?' This is the question and the test at the Edison studio." Again we pride ourselves on the fact that this is carrying into effect an advance in an important branch of moving picture making which we have many times advocated. The company are clearly determined to give the public good moving picture plays, well acted and well photographed, and are evidently resolved to take the lead in the work. In this excellent spirit of employing the very best possible talent in all branches of the preparation of moving picture making the company have only to persevere to be assured of unassailable pre-eminence.

We interpret the progressive and enterprising spirit shown in the "Kinetogram" as evidence on the part of moving picture makers in this country that they have fully grasped the still undeveloped possibilities of the moving picture as a form of entertainment and instruction, and are resolved to give it every chance of retaining the hold on public favor which it has secured. Only a few short months ago there was grave danger of that hold slackening, but now, thanks to the broad-mindedness and enterprise of the Edison Company and other manufacturing firms, that danger is averted and we look forward to a prosperous and successful growth in popular esteem of the silent drama.

Hillsdale, Mich.—J. J. Pavey has sold his Nickelo Theater in the Cohn building to J. J. Heator and Geo. Drinkwater. Mr. Pavey had built up a good business and retires from the field to study voice culture, his rendering of the solos in his theater having been a drawing feature of the show.

The Independent Film Releases.

An exhibitor writes: "We keep track of all the licensed films through your paper, but the independent releases are more or less a mystery. It seems to us that if you more fully listed the independent films it would better please your readers." An independent exchange manager also wrote some time ago: "While we advertise in your paper, it looks very much as if you were bound to the trust, as, with few exceptions, the independent releases are never given, neither do you print the stories of the independent films, except those of a few who advertise with you." The latter part of this assertion is true, but we are not "bound to" anyone and it is our weekly endeavor to print all information in regard to the films that is of value to our readers—unlicensed as well as licensed. The independent exchange manager also intimates that it is because the International Projecting and Producing Company do not advertise in this paper that we no longer give space to listing their releases or film stories. The best reply we can make to this is to print the following letter received from the International Projecting and Producing Company:

Chicago, Ill., June 14, 1909.

Moving Picture World,
125 East Twenty-third street,
New York City, N. Y.

Gentlemen—We have a copy of your paper, issue of June 12, with a description of subjects released by the International Projecting and Producing Co. We strenuously object to your publishing any matter regarding our subjects without our permission. In future it would be well to consult this office or our New York representatives before publishing any matter pertaining to the International Projecting and Producing Co. Very truly yours,

INTERNATIONAL PROJECTING AND PRODUCING CO.

Previous to this we listed their releases and went to much trouble to procure the film stories, even writing them up from private exhibitions of the films at the local exchanges. On asking why it was desired that this be discontinued we were informed that it interfered with the sale of surplus prints or back numbers. All the licensed manufacturers and some of the independents send us advance bulletins, as they appreciate the value of listing their products in the trade paper and we owe it as a duty to our readers to print this information. We exert ourserves to keep this information accurate and up-to-date, and if any film lists or film stories are missing it is because the manufacturer or importer has neglected to furnish us with the copy or refused it when asked for.

To Moving Picture Exhibitors.

IMPORTANT SERIES OF ARTICLES.

In next week's MOVING PICTURE WORLD we shall commence the publication of a series of articles, especially compiled for the information, instruction and help of owners of moving picture theaters. We have gathered in those articles, a mass of information which we think will be helpful to the man who conducts a moving picture theater. We shall endeavor to tell him how best to administer his house, both in his own interest and that of the general public. We shall deal with all phases of the business as a business.

The operating end of matters has been fully treated in our columns by Mr. Richardson. What we propose doing in the contemplated series of articles is to deal with matters of detail: Administration, decoration, lighting, equipment, and, broadly speaking, the best way to fit the moving picture theater for the patronage of the public. In other words, we shall assume that a man is just about to open a moving picture theater and wants advice as to how best to go about the matter. This we shall tell him

No such series of articles has ever been published as the result of practical experience and observation, therefore we are confident they will be of direct service to the thousands of our exhibiting readers. The series will begin next week, September 4, and will continue until completed. We advise all readers to order or obtain their copies of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD early, as there is certain to be an increased demand for the papers containing these articles.

CECIL SPOONER ON THE MOVING PICTURE STAGE.

A correspondent writes us from Atchison, Kan.:

"While Miss Cecil Spooner enjoys her full share of reputation in theatrical circles, she is quite new to moving picture theater patrons and her name on a poster causes no unusual stir. Not so in this city, from whence came the family and where, in old Corinthian Hall years ago, this celebrated artist first gathered laurels in abundance.

"'The Prince and the Pauper' and a Gaumont was the bill at the Crystal, August 10 and 11, and the reputation of 'The Spooners' in this city, having so well withstood the ravages of time, the house was filled to overflowing the first evening. The writer entered the cosy little theater early in the evening of the second day's run and found the place about one-fourth full. During the run of the Gaumont reel the seating capacity was exhausted and the side walls were lined with spectators unable to obtain seats. Many times was heard the inquiry, 'Has Cecil come on yet?' When 'Cecil' did come on there was a sudden lull in the low conversations and during the entire run of the reel there was absolutely no sound aside from that of the machine and the piano, only to be followed by an outbreak of favorable comment as the film passed off the machine. The excellence of the film shared with Cecil in the universal favor of the audience, only a small portion of which had ever witnessed 'The Spooners' on the stage. This is written by one uninterested in the moving picture business solely to make known the appreciation retained in the hearts of Atchison people for the Spooners, and to testify that good photography and good acting will fill a house on a hot night."

The Edison Company's Kinetogram, for August 1, contains the following article:

"Miss Cecil Spooner was especially employed to enact the difficult dual role of Tom Canty, the pauper boy, and Edward, the boy Prince of Wales, in the film production of Mark Twain's celebrated story, 'The Prince and the Pauper.' Graceful, effective and polished as an actress, her finished art has contributed much to the beauty and strength of this notable silent drama. Yet it was not without misgivings she entered upon her task.

"'I was very much afraid,' she said, 'when I first faced the camera. From what I had seen of motion pictures before, I feared it would be impossible to get much art in such tabloid plays. The story was so big, the best that was in one so necessary, it seemed hopeless. Yet now Iam convinced that not only can the highest type of mimic art be successfully presented in the films, but that they are helpful to the player's fuller grasp of work. They inculcate what the American actor needs most—the art of expression and gesture. Depending upon the spoken word and inflexions of the voice so much on the stage, these necessary things are almost forgotten. The motion picture revived this in me, it has really helped me. The experience was helpful and beneficial. I was almost sorry when the three weeks needed for the rehearsals and photographic work were at an end. I believe that now that the best players on the stage are beginning to embark in this pantomimic work, the stage productions themselves will be lifted up wonderfully in their interpretation through the greater skill the motion picture work will give the actors. Not only is the motion picture field helping the theater by making more numerous the army of playgoers, but it is helping the actors in their work.'"

"The Galley Slave," the first of the Vitagraph films de luxe of "Les Miserables," will be released September 4. It deals with the incident of the Bishop's candlesticks, done into a sketch for James K. Hackett's vaudeville appearances, and is said to be a remarkably faithful depiction of this dramatic situation. Other studios will follow in rapid order.

Observations by Our Man About Town.

LOCAL PICTURES.

I met a film exchange manager on the street the other day and he was certainly in a bad mood. I asked the cause, and this is what he gave me: "I have just left my office to take a stroll and cool off. I have just read a letter from one of our customers that 'got my goat' and I had to get out and get some fresh air." Naturally, I inquired the cause of his unrest, and he told me the customer had pounded him in the letter for not making arrangements to have pictures taken of some event that was scheduled for the town in which the customer is located. "I don't blame the customer for his enterprise," said the exchange man, "but he should be reasonable. He is paying me good money and I am willing to do anything within reason to help him make money, but this making of pictures of every parade, balloon ascension or horse race a town may have, is pressing good-nature to the danger point. I can't take and produce the pictures, nor will it pay me to spend what he will pay me in three months to have the pictures made."

Film exchange people who are worried in this manner are certainly deserving of more than ordinary consideration. It is noticeable that managers of nickelodeons are developing the craze for local pictures in almost reckless fashion. I took up the question with an exhibitor a few weeks ago and believe I convinced him that the time has not arrived when that kind of enterprise appetite can be appeased. The first gun he fired at me was that several years ago traveling picture shows had photographers in advance taking pictures, which were shown in the respective towns the companies had booked. He was correct as to this. I remember this very well, and I also remember very well that it did not last long. It was too expensive. Aside from that, the conditions existing then differed considerably in comparison with the conditions of to-day. There were no nickelodeons then. The shows played the big houses at regular prices, with the local views as features. A strip of a hundred or two feet of local film was like some added attraction to a big show. A hundred dollars spent in that way generally drew a $500 or $600 house, where the show would probably only draw $200 or $300 without the local pictures. I know of one company that spent over $1,000 in preparing local views in a large city, and its share for the week the show played the place was almost $3,000. Besides this, a return engagement was played, with a change of program, excepting the local pictures, and the company's share was close to $1,200. Double the amount spent in taking local pictures to-day, with all the improvements in taking and making them considered, would not draw $3,000 gross for the entire week in the same town. Why? Because the place has its quota of picture theaters; the regular house scale of prices cannot be charged these for a picture show; local views cannot be used for an entire evening's program; interesting and novel as they may be, they become monotonous even to those who seek them, and the public can see the other pictures at much lower prices.

Some nickelodeon managers have figured that moving pictures of some big local event would double and sometimes treble, their receipts for a week, and they have offered to very generously contribute to the expense of securing them. In many cases exchanges have expressed a willingness to give a week's service for nothing in order to help defray the expense and accommodate a good customer, but the project has invariably fallen through after the expense has been detailed. The making of such subjects is not as costly as it was, but it is still too costly to provide nickelodeons with features of that kind. A reel of film is supposed to run about sixteen or eighteen minutes. If a nickelodeon manager was willing to spend $300 or $400 to feature a local subject he would in all probability expect to get fifteen to twenty minutes of pictures, and he would have to double his price of admission, or have a mighty good house, to make good the investment; but, liberal as this expenditure may appear, it would fall short of what a reel would cost. The taking of local views is special work, and this, according to current quotations, costs from 35 to 75 cents per foot, besides the expenses of the photographers in securing the negatives. Then there is another thing to be considered. The finished product is not the true basis of calculation. The photographer may take 1,500 or 2,000 feet of negative for a 1,000-foot finished picture, and the contracting party must at least pay the cost of the surplus stock. The taking of moving pictures has not been reduced to a nicety whereby every foot in the camera can be placed upon a reel for reproduction.

I believe I have covered in this article what scores of film exchanges have tried to cover in a volume of correspondence. After reading advance copy to some of my exchange friends, I have been told that the exchanges should feel thankful to me that I have touched upon the subject. When the exchanges themselves reply as I have written, the exhibitors frequently doubt their sincerity and feel that there is either a lack of appreciation of the circumstances or a desire to shirk a little extra work or the sacrifice of a little money to make a hit. Some exhibitors have become very sore against their exchanges on this local picture taking question, and in many instances they have changed their service, but in all cases where the matter has been thoroughly weighed, exhibitors have become convinced that the outlay absolutely required would not be justified.

Some exhibitors have insisted that a hundred or two feet of some local subject would be a big winner for them. In this they have been mistaken. Such short subjects, not what their bearing may be, fail in effect. It is a waste of money to invest in them. The idea is almost as foolish as that of the enthusiastic man who is about to set his town on fire with his enterprise. He is going to open an up-to-date house and "kill" the people with his first program. He wants four or five reels of film covering all interesting points and scenes in and about his town. If the place is big enough to make the amount of film he wants it is a good one, but were it twice as good it would not be difficult to figure how long he would stay in the business.

The use of local moving pictures as features in nickelodeons is not a remote possibility. At present the attending expense is apparently prohibitive, but this expense will gradually drop. Competition between the licensed and independent people will gradually bring this about. The demand for local views on the part of managers is growing, and possibly it must be met at some time, but when that time comes many nickelodeon managers may have cause for regret. If one gets local views, his competitor will spare no expense to get the same. Each town's supply of local subjects is limited. A craze in that direction will gradually drift to the ridiculous and discount the efforts expended to the higher standards of the picture business. It does not take a keen observer to see what will happen. When the managers are taken up with local pictures the manufacturers of the higher grade of subjects will be seeking outlets for their pictures. When the local field is worked out and the managers turn to the old sources of supply they will in all probability be informed that the demand is exceeding the supply. In other words, when the managerial enterprise forces the condition that moving pictures practically become like newspapers, the manufacturers who cater to the artistic and instructive will have become, in a sense, if not altogether so, direct producers, and the exhibitors will have a serious problem before them if they wish to adhere to the same line of business.

The danger of forcing the local picture taking lies in the fact that the sphere is a limited one in every respect. A picture taken in a particular town is of no value outside of it, with the exception of views taken in the large cities, and these must have attached to them more or less national prominence or reputation. A local picture used by a nickelodeon will not be used by a competing house in the same town, and no matter how much interest may attach to the picture locally, it would put to sleep an audience fifteen or twenty miles away. Local subjects are practically topical subjects. Like newspapers, they are looked over and then thrown upon the scrap heap. Experience has proved that the story, historical, educational and travel pictures are the only survivors. Pictures of some great conflagration hold the interest of the public until the newspapers reduce space on it; the pictures of the earthquakes in San Francisco and Italy excited immense interest for—how long? How many people recall either of the occurrences, and how many ask for the pictures? The sporting populace clamor for the pictures of some big fight for about a month after the event; then, like the defeated gladiator, the pictures go upon the shelf. Not so with the story pictures. Like the books from which they are adapted, they found a friendship with the people, and the stories they tell are appreciated whenever reflected upon the screen. Local and topical subjects are, after all, too close to home. They lack the romance and grandeur that the other subjects portray. To tell the truth, people do not want to see themselves as others see them. They want to see how other people look.

The taste of the public is a peculiar one, so much so that photography is a dangerous thing to handle when local favor is looked for. The camera has pranks and sometimes brings woe to its dependents. A case in point is recalled where pictures were taken in a Massachusetts town. In one of them the manager of the theater where the pictures were to be shown was portrayed with his arm about a woman. The operator of the camera did not know it was not the manager's wife, and as the film was not censored before it was thrown upon the screen, the manager himself did not realize the effect of the pose until after the show.

OLIVER.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

Annette Kellerman posed for the Vitagraph Company of America this week, performing her diving feats as well as her physical culture exercises and diabolo playing. Some of the pictures were taken in the Vitagraph's fifty-foot tank, while others were made in the country, Miss Kellerman devoting several days to the posing.

A cablegram to Mr. Ben Nathan from his London associates discloses an important deal which has been consummated with several European firms of high standing in the manufacturing field. While we do not care to go into details until the documents arrive, we will say that the matter has great bearing upon the independent outlook and will greatly benefit the independent exhibitor. Mr. Mosheim, president of the Film Import and Trading Co., leaves for Europe this week to close the contracts.

The Cinephone, which has already been described in these pages, will be placed on the market during the next fortnight by the Film Import and Trading Co., who have acquired the American rights. A factory is in course of construction to make illustrations for the latest American songs; meanwhile, they have some 300 subjects on hand. The records will be made by the Victor Talking Machine Co., who have perfected a compact sound producing box which also contains the synchronizing device. This box also amplifies the sound fully four times that of the ordinary Victor phonograph. The Cinephone talking and singing pictures will be distributed by agents who will have exclusive territory, and this offers an opportunity to wideawake exchanges to get territorial rights to something which will enable them to offer exclusive service.

The Vitagraph Company of America announce the engagement of the Rev. Madison C. Peters, the eminent New York divine, to write and produce for them a series of motion pictures dealing with Biblical subjects; the first of these being a series of reels dealing with the life of Moses, starting with the decree of death for the firstborn of the Jews and ending with the death of Moses on Mount Horeb. With his vast knowledge of the Holy Land of Biblical times as well as to-day, Dr. Peters is splendidly qualified to prepare a series of films that shall be accurate in history and setting, replete with dramatic action and entirely reverent in spirit. The first of these pictures will be put in rehearsal next week, and the Vitagraph scenic studios will be busy with reproductions of Eastern settings for some time.

"HALLBERG" EQUIPMENT FOR THEATERS IN ALBUQUERQUE, N. M.

Two weeks ago, for the first time, the editor of the Moving Picture World called at the office of Mr. J. H. Hallberg to get expert opinion on a certain electrical problem. We were greatly impressed with the magnitude of the plant and learned that the Hallberg Economizer was being shipped to the remotest parts of the country. (Advertising in the World pays.) The Pastime Amusement Co., Albuquerque, N. M., subscribers to the World, who are opening two new moving picture houses, have just installed two double lamp automatic electric Economizers. These Economizers are made to operate two 35-ampere lamps at one time for the dissolving stereopticon. When it is necessary to operate the moving picture lamp, the same Economizer gives automatically 60 to 65 amperes to the moving picture lamp. The installation is somewhat different from the ordinary, in that the distances from the lens to the screen are upwards of 130 feet and the picture is very large; therefore, a very powerful and steady light is required, and the Economizers are especially made and built for this installation. The Economizers operate on 110-volt 60-cycle current, and the saving guaranteed is 66 per cent. as compared with rheostat control. A rheostat would not give satisfactory results for these installations, as it is very difficult, if not impossible, to control 60 to 70 amperes in the moving picture lamp with a rheostat, whereas the control is absolutely automatic when the Economizer is used.

TONING LANTERN SLIDES.

By T. Thorne Baker.

Methods of Toning.

There are two distinct ways of altering the tone of a lantern slide; it may be developed out with a colored image, when a permanent result is obtained, or it may be developed out black in the ordinary manner, and the image converted into one composed of an altered chemical compound with, of course, an altered color. One cannot help feeling some surprise that so little advantage is taken of the first method. By slightly over-exposing a chloride or chloro-bromide plate, and using a suitable solution for its development, it is possible to obtain red, yellow, mauve, sepia and brown tones; these may be toned by means of a gold bath, and a bright blue result produced. As far as chemistry can tell us, all such results are unalterable, especially as the film is generall protected from atmospheric influences by the cover glass. The production of these colored images is a purely physical process; it is difficult to explain how the silver image can be obtained in such a variety of tints, but probably only partial reduction of the original salts takes place. It is certain, however, that if the image be slightly warm instead of black, it is readily amenable to treatment with a gold bath, and thus we have a still further variety of colors at our disposal.

Despite the straightforward nature of the operations, the certainty with which they may be carried out, and the inexpensive nature of this process, the majority of workers prefer to get a good black-tone slide, and alter it to a brown, green or blue by means of the copper, uranium or iron baths. We shall therefore describe those methods of toning with uranium, etc., which are particularly applicable to lantern plates, but shall first devote some little attention to the direct method above referred to.

It need hardly be said that a special form of developer is first of all desirable; and we shall assume that chloride lantern plates are to be used. (There is no difficulty in obtaining these, as several makers manufacture large quantities of them.)

Development Method.

Where several slides are to be made, and time is not an object, the easiest way to obtain bright red tones is by slight over-exposure and very weak development with hydroquinone and caustic soda. A good developer for dilution in this way will be found as follows:

A.	Hydroquinone	15 grains
	Potassium metabisulphite	15 grains
	Potassium bromide	3 grains
	Water	4 ounces
B.	Caustic soda	20 grains
	Water	4 ounces

Ten per cent. bromide solution is also necessary, as it is desirable to vary the quantity of restrainer to produce the differences of tone. The exposure should be given to daylight, and may vary from twice to twenty times the normal, more bromide being added to the developer as exposure is increased. As a typical example we might take the following. Fifty seconds' exposure is given to a plate under a medium negative to diffused daylight (i. e., not direct sunlight). One ounce each of A and B are mixed together, and ten ounces of water and a few drops of bromide solution added. In very weak gaslight the development may now be carried out, but as it will take perhaps twenty minutes or longer, it is as well to do several at once.

A few trials will enable one to find out to what extent exposure must be increased, and the developer diluted in order to give a desired color, and if several slides are wanted all of one tint, identical results will be obtained by giving the same time for exposure and development. Half a dozen plates may be placed in a 10 x 8-inch dish, and covered with developer, and left to develop up at leisure, being examined perhaps every five or ten minutes.

Such is the easiest and most direct way of producing warm tones. But the length of time necessary is frequently a drawback, and when speed is a weighty matter we must make use of some other method. There are two other developers eminently fitted for giving warm tones, and these are ferrous citrate and edinol. The makers recommend a formula containing edinol, with a quantity of bisulphite, and a minimum of alkali, but in practice we have found the developer below to be of more general utility.

Edinol	15 grains
Acetone sulphite	75 grains
Ammonium carbonate	15 grains
Ammonia (.880)	15 minims

The quantity of ammonia has to be altered according to the tone that one wants, as it regulates the speed of development, and the speed in its turn governs the tone or color of the image.

For developing over-exposed plates to a warm red or yellow color, the following iron formula will be found an excellent one:

A.	Citric acid	20 parts
	Ammonium carbonate	10 parts
	Water	30 parts
B.	Ferrous sulphate	5 parts
	Sulphuric acid	5 parts
	Water	18 parts
C.	Common salt	18 parts
	Water	100 parts

No definite instructions can be given as regards exposure, but the amount of over-exposure necessary to give the desired color can readily be ascertained by an experiment or two. Three parts of A are mixed with one part of B, and a drop or two of C added. The tone becomes more red according to the amount of C added. It will be found far more expeditious to use daylight for the exposure of chloride plates—to which the above developer is particularly applicable—as with gaslight such a long time is often necessary.

It is a singular thing that, provided the image obtained by development be at all warm in color, it may be toned by a gold bath; a red slide, if placed in the combined toning and fixing bath instead of ordinary hypo, will assume a chocolate tint during fixation. But beautiful deep blue and violet colors may be got by toning a red or warm black slide, after it has been fixed and thoroughly washed, in some such bath as the following:

Ammonium sulpho-cyanide	30 grains
Water	10 ounces
Gold chloride	2 grains

A short washing after being toned is sufficient to make the slides permanent.

A good iron formula for chloride plates has been given by Pizzighelli, as follows:

A.	Citric acid	30 parts
	Water	70 parts
	Ammonia (.880)	15 parts
B.	Ferrous sulphate	10 parts
	Water	30 parts
C.	Salt	1 part
	Water	30 parts

For rich red tones use A, 15 parts; B, 5 parts; C, 1 part.

Toning Baths.

We shall assume next that a black image has been obtained in the ordinary way upon either a bromide or chloride lantern plate, and that it is desired to convert it into a colored picture. This must be done by causing a deposition of some metal upon the reduced silver of the image, or by converting it into a compound substance by means of some metallic salt. There are four chief colors which may be imparted to the black slide, though a large number of tints may be obtained which we class under one or other of these heads:

Red, including orange, red, sepia, etc.
Blue, including bright blue, dark blue, greenish blue.
Green, including bluish-green, dark green.
Greenish-Blacks, to be generally avoided.

Some of the latter tints are very suitable for certain subjects, but they are extremely uncertain as regards their production.

Copper baths we shall leave alone, and describe only the uranium methods, with which we have had many years' experience. Two solutions are all that are necessary, and they are made up as follows:

A.	Uranium nitrate	30 grains
	Potassium ferricyanide	25 grains
	Acetic acid	5 drops
	Water	6 ounces

First dissolve the uranium, then add the other chemicals; shake well from time to time, keep for a week, and filter. The filtered solution keeps indefinitely in the dark, or in a deep orange bottle.

B.	Ferric-chloride	15 grains
	Water	3½ ounces

The one thing essential to success is to use a thoroughly well washed black-tone lantern slide, and in order to make sure that all the hypo is removed, we have found a short soaking in Iodosal solution very effective.

A gives all red tones, according to length of immersion. When of the desired color, the slide must be placed in a 2 per cent. solution of ammonium sulphocyanide until the whites are clear, and then well washed.

If now placed in B for a few moments, rinsed and dried, a green tone will be obtained. Longer immersion produces green-black tones, and finally blue. If a bright blue color be desired, it is only necessary to rinse a slide when toned with B after A in very diluted nitric acid.

There we have the whole method in a nutshell, so to speak; columns of writing are quite useless, as a few simple experiments will show the reader what a variety of colors can be obtained when the operations are carefully carried out with the baths given.

It must be remembered when making green or blue slides, by using the B solution after treatment with A, that in drying, the color becomes much "bluer," hence for a greenish-blue tone we must wash and dry the plate some time before it has reached the particular shade we desire to have in the finished picture.

Bleaching Methods.

Less direct ways of producing colored slides are also very successful, as was clearly proved recently by M. Molteni, who has obtained some interesting results. An ordinary black lantern slide may be bleached in the following bath:

Water	4 ounces
Mercuric chloride	1 dram
Hydrochloric acid	15 minims

After a good washing, the bleached side is exposed to daylight for a few minutes, and then placed in a ten per cent. hypo bath, when the image will reappear, of a yellowish-brown color. Such tones are quite permanent as far as can be at present gathered.

Another bath for bleaching the slides previous to the daylight exposure is this:

Water	4 ounces
Salt	45 grains
Copper chloride	15 grains

When the image is bleached, the plate is well washed and then exposed to daylight. This produces a bluish-violet picture.

WHAT IS IN THE FUTURE?

F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

What is the future of the motion picture theater? is a question very frequently propounded and many are the answers forthcoming. Recently one of the Chicago city department heads remarked to the writer: "The motion picture theater is a craze just as was the skating rink and will die out in course of time." Only yesterday the manager of one of Chicago's largest theaters asserted to the writer that within three years there would not be fifty nickel theaters left in the city.

Neither of these gentlemen was right! The motion picture theater has come to stay, but its form, so far as our cities are concerned, will be to some extent changed. So far as numbers go the writer believes the motion picture has reached and probably passed its zenith. In every other way, however, the business is still in its infancy. That the "store room theater" will gradually disappear seems certain, but their place will be taken by especially built theaters, seating from five hundred to a thousand, most of them giving a mixed bill of motion pictures and vaudeville at ten cents admission. Many of these are already built and more are projected here in Chicago. Some of them are beautiful and costly houses and all are creditable in appearance. They put up a good show, too, which, as compared to the ordinary nickel house, is usually worth at least three times as much, aside from the superior comfort and beauty of the surroundings. Such houses have almost invariably been found to be a paying investment and in the nature of things the smaller, less comfortable house cannot successfully compete with them, other things being equal.

As to films, the writer believes that ten years from now those of us who still manage to draw our breath will look back and laugh at the crude efforts of to-day. I believe the time will come when all films will be in colors and when the very highest class plays, tragedies, dramas, melodramas, and so on through all the list, will be protrayed in all their detail by motion pictures, making a show two to three hours long. I believe they will be accompanied with perfect wording and sounds and be in all respects the same as we now see plays set forth by actors. I believe there will be absolutely no flicker or vibration on the screen, and I believe that ten years from now motion pictures as above set forth will have largely done away, except possibly in the larger cities, with acted plays.

Now don't say, "the man is crazy!" Remember that just a few short years ago you would have declared the man a lunatic who spoke of lighting buildings with electricity, of standing in Chicago and talking with a man in New York, of listening to the rendition of a singer or a band days or months after it took place and thousands of miles, perhaps, from the place of performance. Yet all this and much more we have to-day. Look back and see what has been accomplished in the motion picture field in the past ten years! It is nothing short of marvelous and makes one hesitate to deny any future possibility.

To talk of the motion picture theater going out of existence is sheer nonsense. The real motion picture theater has but just begun to arrive, and it is a beauty. Likewise real motion pictures have but just appeared on the stage. Manufacturers had to purchase experience, much of it rather bitter. Producers had to learn how to work out a beautiful story within the limits of a thousand feet of film. Actors had to learn how to act without words, or rather act so that the words accompanying their action could be guessed at readily. All this has been, or is being rapidly accomplished. But far better things are in store as fast as the maker learns. To date, in my opinion, there has been one wonderful film made. Others have been photographically better. Others have been better acted. Others have been better staged, but this one stands alone because it actually brought tears to eyes in the audience. You may make an audience laugh, but to make it weep you must have real excellence in the story and its rendition. I mention this film, "Where Is My Wandering Boy To-night?" because it shows the possibilities of motion pictures. If with the comparatively crude apparatus of to-day we can place upon the screen a story that will bring tears to the eyes of strong men, the day will come when all the things I have named and even more will be entirely possible. Of course to depict an ordinary three-act drama, lasting two hours and a half, would require several reels of film, and such a proposition now appears to the manufacturer as an impractical undertaking. But those reels will be made, however, and in ten years more I predict that every meritorious play on the boards will be had in motion pictures. Then and only then will the inhabitants of small towns be able to view a really high class performance. As it is to-day, the play may be a scream in New York, Chicago or other large cities where it is acted by real actors, but while it is the same play in the smaller place it is rendered by barnstormers. With the advent of the motion picture play the barnstormers will retire to the farm whence they came.

I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet. I am not the seventh son of a seventh son of a gun, nor was I born with a veil; but mark me, while you may laugh now, my words will come true!

ESSANAY ISSUES HANDSOME POSTER.

We are in receipt of a handsome litho. title poster of the Essanay subject, "Wonders of Nature," their release of August 18. This is the second, we are informed, of the series of posters they are issuing.

We find the poster an exceptionally attractive one, made in six colors, and measuring 28 by 42 inches. Besides a large illustration, depicting a scene from the film, the design includes the Indian head, the Essanay Company's trade-mark, and the title of the film.

The poster, we feel, should prove a real adornment to any theater lobby or billboard.

The Brayton Manufacturing Co., of Chicago, Ill., have just issued one of the largest lists of high-grade announcement slides that have as yet come to our notice. They also have a very attractive circular on their Baby Show and Young Lady Popularity Contest schemes for picture theaters. They will be pleased to mail any exhibitor these circulars upon request. The Brayton Manufacturing Co. should be complimented on their novel ideas in the interest of the moving picture business, for they were the originators of the above schemes for increasing the box office receipts and hundreds of theaters have found it possible to tide over the warm months by employing either one or both of these contests. They have also made it possible for exhibitors to use advertising slides without displeasing their audiences, simply by making advertising slides in such a thoroughly artistic manner that they meet with universal approval. The sun has set on the day in which cheap, so-called advertising slides and the unsightly home-made ones can be used. Advertising slides may be used now if artistically designed, along the lines of advertisements in our better magazines, with a high degree of success both to the advertiser and the exhibitor. It is possible by employing high-grade slides to materially assist in paying the expenses of picture theaters. It might be suggested that the exhibitor use the proceeds from advertising to better his show, thereby increasing the receipts of the box office. "Advertising Pays Expenses," is the title of an interesting pamphlet that the Brayton Manufacturing Co. are mailing to those who are interested in advertising slides.

Comments on the Week's Films.

LIBERTY FOR AN HOUR (Vitagraph).

This is one of the prettiest pictures the Vitagraph Company have produced. The title is self-explanatory. A convict obtains liberty for an hour, and at the end of that time is back in his cell, a sadder and wiser man, perhaps, and also, perhaps, happier. We should think this particular one was. Imagining ourselves to be a convict for the time being and obtaining an hour's liberty, we wondered what we would do with those sixty minutes. Probably everyone in the audience wondered the same; probably every prisoner, if the question were put to him, would also wonder. Everything, of course, would depend on chance. Our particular convict was the victim of chance or circumstance, and, on the whole, in his sixty minutes' liberty he had a good time. Chased by the guards, he manages to elude them, and finds his way into a field of flowers where a pretty little girl is plucking the buds and blossoms. The child enters into a conversation with him and makes him a present of some of her flowers, which he conceals in his uniform, if we may so call it. Later on the child falls into the water and is rescued from certain death by the convict, just as the guards, and very laggard guards they are, too, appear to arrest him. So having done this good deed in his sixty minutes' liberty, he is taken back again into his prison cell, where we see him taking the child's flowers from his coat and fondly hugging them.

This is a very pretty story of the Vitagraph Company, and they have treated it in a charming vein. The scenes in the flower-laden fields with the children and the by-play between the little girl and the convict are beautifully rendered. Of course, the prisoner is ugly, and the guards are very matter-of-fact and stoggy. This makes the contrast between the romantic and the prosaic parts of this film all the stronger. Frankly, when that convict was hauled back to his prison cell, we felt very sorry for him, as he looked a decent sort of chap—for a convict. This Vitagraph subject pleased us immensely and, as we have said, it also pleased the audience. It is an undoubted success.

THE PRICE OF A SOUL (Edison).

An interpretation of the opening incident in Hugo's masterpiece, Les Miserables. It is the well known scene where Jean Valjean is taken in by the bishop and rewards his benefactor by stealing his silver, and the bishop gives him the candlesticks and tells him that now he must do good and not evil since he has bought his soul for God. Here is another striking drama which clearly indicates the improvement in the serious portion of the motion picture field. To successfully interpret such a scene as this without the aid of the spoken word is an achievement of importance and is an earnest of the future of the motion picture as an entertainer and a teacher. And only the highest praise can be accorded this effort. The scene is reproduced with fidelity to the original narrative and the characters successfully interpret their various parts. The two principal characters, Jean Valjean, the released convict, and the bishop, are true to the story and correctly interpret their parts. It would be difficult to conceive of anything that could improve the work of these two. And at the climax, when the bishop hands the thief the two candlesticks and tells him he evidently forgot to take them with him, the expression upon the face of Valjean is fascinating in its depiction of amazement. And the bishop is quite as lovable in the picture as he is in the story. Indeed, he couldn't well be improved and every move he makes indicates plainly his characteristic goodness. The same observation applies to this picture that has been made regarding others which illustrate stories or important novels. Not more than a small fraction understand them because they have not read the story, or, if they have, it has been in such a cursory manner that it made little or no impression upon them. And yet, the portion who have read them and who appreciate them when reading them enjoy all the more fully the pictures which reproduce them. It is worth while for them to see such pictures. They often give a favorite story a new meaning, or impress it more forcibly upon one's mind. The staging of this picture is in accord with the description of the bishop's home as given in the story, consequently requires no criticism. It has been done with fidelity to the original and that is all the director could do. And the action is quite in keeping with the characters and what they are described as having done. It could not be better. It correctly interprets the spirit of the story as told by Hugo. One could not ask more. The photography has been well done, only here and there does a cloud appear on the film. And the printer has made his positive as good as the photographer made his negative. No more could be asked. The Edison Company is to be congratulated upon this contribution to the best among motion pictures.

WITH HER CARD (Biograph).

A picture in which some of the vagaries of a woman's whims are forcibly delineated. An actress has two lovers, one who really loves her and one whom she really loves, a difference which made a great distinction in this instance. She rejects the one who loves her and the one she loves rejects her. Then she induces the one whom she rejected to ruin the one who rejected her by promising him that she would marry him the day he accomplished it. That is a good mix up for a starter, but it represents the complications which make this film an interesting bit of dramatic work. The actress is the sweet faced Biograph lady whom theatergoers have come to know and look for whenever a Biograph film is seen. And her acting in this picture, when she reads the letter telling her that her lover is about to marry a society belle, could scarcely be equalled. She not only makes her face eloquent of her grief, but her hands add emphasis to what her face says. And then comes the sudden change when she conceives the scheme of having this suitor ruined just to vent her spite. But it is done. Then she repents and teases away from the man whom she coaxed to do it the stocks and returns them with her card. They arrive just as the ruined man is about to commit suicide. Of course he rushes away to find her and undertake to make up. But after apparently deciding to go with him she turns and buries her face on the shoulder of the one she formerly rejected, representing the climax of the unexpected in a woman's action. This is no ordinary love drama. It is a representation of the deeper passions which sometimes sway men and women, and they are represented so subtly that one scarcely realizes how profound the action is until it is over. The scenes representing the fight in Wall street are unique in that they do not show the howling mob of speculators, but the interior of two offices, the two most vitally interested, and the imagination must supply the rest. This is a clever and welcome change from the usual thing in a Wall street battle. There are other forces in Wall street aside from those that make the stock exchange a delirium of noise, and in this picture they are graphically presented. The idea is a good one and is quite as forcible as the other way. The staging is good, and the details are worked out with care and fidelity. Photographically the film is not quite up to the Biograph standard, but in no place is it blurred. It is a little dark here and there, but possibly that was done to give emphasis to the figures which were then on the screen or appeared while the unusual heavy toning was seen. At any rate, whether this was intended or not, that was the effect of the dark film. It is a good picture, full of action and strength, and will be popular with audiences everywhere.

THE COBBLER AND THE MILLIONAIRE (Gaumont).

The acting in this film is so good that one could follow the story even without a title. It is a very old story, older, we believe, than La Fontaine, from whose fables it is avowedly taken. A rich man presents a cobbler with a bag of gold on condition that the cobbler never works again. The cobbler gleefully accepts the money, but he and his wife suffer such agony in taking care of the treasure that finally he returns the money to the millionaire and goes back to honest labor. This story is told against a French setting of a former century; the costumes, the accessories are not of the present day, and so it has a pleasant old world aspect. As we have said, the acting in it is remarkably good, while from the viewpoint of the photography it is exceedingly well done. We have only just outlined the plot as it appears to us. There are several by-issues in it not necessary to refer to, as they are not obvious to the audience. It is a picture which we think is likely to be popular because of the proberb-like simplicity of its story.

A SIMPLE HOUSE DINNER (Edison).

This is a short and simple comedy subject which provokes considerable laughter. A young couple are new to the game of life and the girl decides to please her partner by cooking the dinner. All the necessary viands are obtained and we witness in a delightful kitchen scene the ludicrous inability of the girl to go about the cooking of the dinner in a workmanlike fashion. Finally both escape from the culinary confusion and solace themselves with a dinner at a restaurant. It is a pretty little story, cleverly told, and it took the fancy of the audience, which has not of late been treated to so much pure humor as we could have wished. The film was of a very good photographic quality, but, like the one also noticed on this page, could have been improved had the development of the positive been carried out so as to avoid the appearance of numerous small spots on its surface.

FAR FROM THE MADDING CROWD (Edison).

Here is a genuine comedy subject which provoked the heartiest laughter of the week. A city man, tired of his pampered home life just about vacation time, makes up his mind to go into the country and enjoy the attractions of rusticity. On his journey to the bourne of rest his troubles start. The vehicle containing his grip and other impedimenta breaks down and has to be repaired before the journey can be completed. Arrived at his destination, he is effusively welcomed by the natives, but then his trouble commences. The room in which he sleeps is not palatial. He seeks seclusion in the fields. The cows disturb him, malicious girls break down his hammock, scraggy old maids invade his quietude. He goes fishing and is dipped into the water; the cow pokes her nose into the kitchen, etc., etc. Far from the madding crowd neither repose nor comfort is his, and so, in a prettily tinted scene, he sneaks away from the place with his "duds" and makes his way home to his rooms, where his attentive man servant makes him happy with drinks and things. This littleepisode was quite humorously carried out by the Edison Company, and, as we have said, it secured the hearty applause of the audience. It was well rehearsed and well acted. The only criticism we have to offer is that alluded to above, namely, that the positive might have been freer from those surface markings which unfortunately disfigure so many Edison pictures. We trust that in drawing attention to this defect we may be the means of securing its obviation.

A LITTLE DRUMMER OF 1792 (Gaumont).

The groupings, costumes and acting of this episode of the period when France was torn by internecine warfare constitute a very fine piece of spectacle. The photographic end of matters has been carefully carried out, the lighting, the exposure and the agreeable sepia color of the picture being a positive relief after so many black-and-white pictures. The little drummer boy and his dog are conspicuous in the warfare, and then finally meet a pathetic death at the hands of the enemy, being subsequently buried side by side with military honors. This part of the film is strikingly pathetic, and the movements and the groupings of the soldiers well managed. It is but an episode, and a pretty one, and will be appreciated by those (and there are many) with whom the troubles of the French at the latter end of the eighteenth century always make fruitful subjects for reading and illustration.

THE JUDGE'S WHISKERS (Vitagraph).

A judge has the misfortune to fall asleep just after having his hair cut. He is a very hirsute man with a very full beard. Now, the tonsorial artist, or, rather, his employee, was an intensely humorous man; in fact, he is the funniest man we have seen on the moving picture screen for months and months. He was just a concentrated laugh. The spirit of devilment possessed him. He cuts off the judge's whiskers and moustache and gives him a clean shave, much to the horror of that good man, who, when he wakes up, is angry, and when he returns home is accused of being an impostor. However, all ends happily, for in a single night, by the application of a hair fertilizer, his beard and moustache grow again right in full view of the audience, of course. The reader will therefore see that this film is full of merriment, but to our eyes the most attractive feature was the intensely excruciating humor of that bewildering barber. He was a laugh himself, and it made people laugh to look at him laughing. Whoever he is, he is an actor, and he earned his money in that film.

"Furnished Rooms to Let."—A comedy from the Edison studio which represents two boys taking advantage of the supposed departure of their parents to the country for the Summer to let rooms in the house. They get the rooms filled, but there are complications among the guests, and in the midst of the altercation the owner returns. A change in time table compels a wait of three hours for a train. The struggling mass of humanity is cleared out by the police and peace once more reigns in the domicile. The action is very spirited and the film has a good deal of fun mixed up in it.

"How Brown Got Married."—A Lubin comedy which is funny because of its absurdity and its suggestiveness. Brown's marriage plans went somewhat awry, yet he managed to arrive, notwithstanding his hold up, and was wedded only a few minutes late. It cannot be said that his costume was in strict conformity with the accepted ideas of those who usually attend weddings, but perhaps if neither he nor the bride objected no one else had any cause to complain. The fun is in the absurdity rather than in anything particularly amusing in what was done to detain him. Technically the film is satisfactory and the action is in keeping with the subject and its development.

"The Hungry Actor."—A Lubin comedy in which the audience is treated to a representation of a clever ruse by which an actor obtains a meal. It is short, and has considerable rough house in it, though like all the Lubin comedies it is funny. Technically it is satisfactory.

"A Cold Plunge in Moscow."—A Pathe which reproduces a bath in the river at Moscow in midwinter. It doesn't seem to have much point and one might well wonder why good film was wasted upon such an inconsequental subject. If a man wants to be foolhardy enough to take a bath in midwinter it should not require a motion picture to preserve his foolishness. Film is too expensive for that.

"An Heroic Father."—A beautifully colored Pathe reproducing the act of a father who rescued his boy from brigands who stole him from under the eyes of the nurse. It is of the swashbuckler, melodramatic type of picture, whose principal interest is in the scenic beauties which are beyond what Pathe usually offers. The scenes are all pictorial and the effect is heightened by the marvelously natural coloring. The film is to that extent, at least, interesting, but the stealing of the boy and his recapture offer no opportunity or dramatic ability beyond the pistol shooting type. Perhaps the action, which is spirited, is sufficiently strong to compensate for lack of dramatic interest and those who love pictures, as pictures, not because they present any sort of action, will like this. Technically it is better than the average film from the Pathe studios, which is perhaps praise enough.

"Out of Work."—A Kalem melodramatic film with all the interesting and lively characteristics of a good melodrama, in which the under dog rises to the most prominent place and the villain is led away while the crowd looks on and cheers. It is a dramatic moment when Tom is refused work, while the daughter of the opulent farmer pleads for him to the very evident disgust of the villain, who is exerting his utmost effort to win her affection. And the runaway is very vivid. When the horse goes tearing down the pike it looks like a runaway. Of course the man who was refused work stopped the runaway and took the girl back home. He is rewarded with the place that was refused him before, and the cheers of his comrades, and the villain swears vengeance. Then comes a robbery, of which Tom is accused and he is about to be led away when the small boy appears with the money, tells the story of the robbery, the officers seize the villain, let Tom go, and he gets a permanent situation caring for the girl right there. The setting is particularly good, the farm scenes being natural and the points selected picturesque. Further, the tonal qualities are an improvement over some of the earlier Kalem pictures, showing progress in that direction, too. The acting is spirited and the players seem to do what real persons would be likely to do under similar circumstances. It is a good picture, and will give any audience a thrill.

"Tylda, the Lion Tamer."—A Raleigh & Roberts picture which has caught some of the darkness that enshrouds so many foreign films. It is a tale of love and jealousy, and has a suicide by poison, with a death in a lion's den as a variation. Quite the most interesting feature of it is the lady in the den with the lions, which she trains with the greatest success. The picture is intensely real and is, for that reason, interesting, but it would have been far more attractive had the jealousy and suicide been left out. It doesn't require these things to make interesting pictures, and surely they are anything but instructive or entertaining. The acting, where the jealousy and hatred develop, is not as good as it might be. The film is not technically up to the standard. Halation, or something equally as bad, has caused trouble with the film in places and the half tones are entirely wanting. Some of the night scenes are good, but wherever a bright light occurs halation spoils the picture.

"A Tale of Texas."—If the Centaur people are going to put out films like this the independent exhibitors will not have to complain for lack of quality. They will be encouraged by this vigorous youngster who is offering films that seem to be real flesh and blood, with the story and the acting in harmony and with movement sufficiently interesting and exciting to make the audience wonder what to expect next. In this one sees all the breeziness of the Western plains, with its characteristic life enacted before one's eyes. The pictures speak, though not in words, and the stories they tell are so true and so convincing that they seem like real personages. There is plenty of action, which has as its basis a genuine article of good, red blood and this always tells in a picture, as it does everywhere else. And when in this particular film the real robber is discovered and the accused man is released to remain with his wife and new born son there is a vigorous round of applause to testify to the strong feeling of the audience. This film is technically good. The scenario has been worked out with care, and, so far as the writer saw, the details were substantially correct, and the writer has been where this scene was supposed to be laid. The photograph is clear, while the printer has done his work in such a way that he has taken full advantage of the opportunities the photographer offered. The Centaur pictures excel in one thing technically. Where the figures are close to the camera they are kept perfectly clear and sharp. Not a figure in this entire long film is blurred. It is well worth seeing and will rank favorably with any Western scene ever turned out.

"Mr. Isaacs and the Sporting Mice."—A Crieks & Martin film which is a silhoutte, varied by having the pictures white instead of black. They are the amusing antics of a number of mice who do all sorts of funny stunts, while Mr. Isaacs, whose face is very mobile, and whose nose changes shape constantly, looks on. It is an amusing picture and quite out of the ordinary run of such films.

"Foolshead, a Sportsman for Love."—An Italia in which Foolshead undertakes some more of his foolhardy trieks for love, and finally gets bounced when his airship comes to grief and he falls at the feet of his inamorata in a huge heap of wreckage.

"An Unexpected Guest."—A Lubin which seems to be somewhat uncalled for. To place upon the screen the story of a young couple who loved not wisely but too well, and then to have the fruit of that love produced at the man's wedding to another woman seems to be too much of an imposition. The photography is good and to a certain extent the picture may interest those who are thoughtless, but there is a certain degree of delicacy which should be observed about such matters that is plainly violated here. The picture serves no useful purpose. It is not instructive and cannot be called entertaining. The reason for its existence is not plain and the silent drama would be improved if the picture was never shown again.

"A Trip to Jupiter."—A magic from the Pathe studio in which one of those interesting trips to the stars is varied by a trip to Jupiter and the experiences of the man who insisted upon going, form a lively film which amuses, and while it does not instruct, it certainly does not leave any disagreeable impression. It is well colored and is perfectly clear in its technical details.

"Cigar Butt Pickers of Paris."—A Pathe which illustrates a peculiar industry, giving a clear idea of the way the pickers work and closes by telling what the tobacco thus secured is used for—as a germ killer on plants.

A WORD FROM MR. EDISON.

[From The Kinetogram.]

When I invented the modern moving picture in the Summer of 1889, I sought to do for the eye what the phonograph had done for the ear. The growth of the business since then, the high character of the pictures made by my own company, and other American and foreign manufacturers under my patents, and the thousands of theaters, many of which were built especially for the purpose, represent a development that has far exceeded my most ambitious hope.

I am proud of the moving picture industry, of the effect it has had and must have in the education and entertainment of the public, and of my own part in the development. Living, as we do, in an age of rapid-fire growth, in my opinion the moving picture will do much towards the intellectual development of the American people. In the twinkling of an eye one may visit cities and places of scenic and historic interest; and in the passage of but a few minutes books, poems and dramas that we may not have the time nor inclination to read may be brought before us, in tabloid form, it is true, but sufficiently in detail to be perfectly comprehensible.

The moving picture has brought within the means of all the opportunity to cultivate and broaden and delight the mind that in the old days was only possible by much travel and extensive reading; and I predict that in the years to come a good part of the education and culture of our citizens will be based on this particular source of amusement.

LOST REELS.

New York, August 13, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—The following reels were stolen from us on August 11, 1909. This practice has become so frequent that there ought to be something done to bring this to a halt. The trade will greatly oblige us by notifying us immediately in case anybody will try to dispose of same: "Child's Love," "Spanish Army"—one reel; "Woodchopper's Daughter."

Thanking you in advance, we remain,

Yours very truly,

MORE CONCERNING THE OPERATOR.

By One of Them.

Chicago, Ill., August 16, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—A writer for the World in August 14 issue takes what can be construed only as a "fling" at operators. Now, as regards Mr. Laemmle's offer to treat the operator better than ordinarily is done in New York, let me say that if New York is anything like Chicago there certainly is room for decided improvement. Once, and once only, the writer consented to deliver and get the film at the exchange, and this is how it worked: The exchange insisted on delivery by or before noon. After delivering the film, I frequently had to wait for two long hours before getting my new service, and then I often took it without inspection to avoid further delay, inspecting it at home. That is the only time the writer undertook to do the boss's work and get the film, and he will never do it again. He has often witnessed a crowd of men waiting for film at an exchange, however, and knows that the imposition is practiced right along. That delay is necessary in delivering service I admit, and often the delay is considerable, but he has noted time and again that when a lot of operators are waiting for their film an owner will come in and be served almost at once. Now, if Mr. Laemmle can and will serve the operators better than they have been served, I fail to see where the anomaly comes in. It strikes me that he is entitled to credit. Surely no one will seriously object to even an operator being treated right! The writer in his article puts words into the mouth of a New York operator which make him out a typical wharf rat. I hardly am ready to believe such a one represents the operators of New York. The writer of the article must have taken the conversation down (?) in shorthand and perhaps could not read his writing, and set it forth in his own customary language. I can see no other lucid explanation. One manager, or owner, complains that every operator he has had is more interested in the girls who come to the show than in the show itself. He is fair enough to say, however, that he may have simply had bad luck in his selection of operators, thus not issuing a blanket condemnation. I think his complaint shows on the face of it that he has employed only young men, and very young ones at that. Probably if he tried a man of, say, thirty-five or forty years, who already is supplied with a family, his complaint might vanish. Of course, however, he couldn't get such a one for ten dollars a week. One manager speaks of "confining the operator to his strict sphere of duty," so that he will have nothing to do with film service. Umph! It strikes me that the matter of film service is very much in line of the operator's duty. Who is it handles the film? Who gets the roasting if the film is in poor condition? Who has to take the risk of fire, which may cost him his license, his reputation, and even his life? The writer has told the boss to get different service or another operator before now, and probably will do it again. He does his work, and does it right, as several managers in Chicago can and will tell you. He considers he has a reputation as an operator to maintain and refuses to have it ruined by a film exchange which furnishes uninspected junk. I have every respect for my employer as long as he behaves himself, just as I have for any other man; but I have absolutely no reverence for him. He is not one darned bit better than am I in any way, shape, manner or form. I don't take his money. I take the money I have earned after I have earned it and it is mine, not his. It makes me tired to hear men talking, as one does in the article in question, about the employee "taking his employer's money (his wages)." He doesn't! It is his own and he has earned it. If he hasn't, the employer is a chump if he doesn't fire him. I fully expect my employer (who will read this article, I suppose) to bounce me if I don't do my work and do it well, and by that same token I'll fire him if he doesn't treat me right—that is to say, I'll fire him as my boss. One manager in the article talks sound sense. He frankly admits that there are two classes of operators (as I have all along contended), the real ones and the would-be's. That is the whole matter in a nutshell. I have taken the writer of the article in question to task before for attempting to throw mud at operators as a whole. The writer is an operator, and he takes such broad slaps as a personal insult which he is not conscious of having merited. I am sure, too, that thousands of other men feel the same about it. Such slurs can serve no good end. If some operators are dishonest and are taking bribes for switching service, they cannot be too strongly condemned, but it would seem that the film exchange they take the bribe from is equally guilty with them and to be condemned in precisely the same degree. But this would not warrant me in saying broadly that film exchanges are dishonest scallawags who are demoralizing operators. I might charge that some of them are, but in decency that is as far as I could go. OPERATOR.

AN AMERICAN EXHIBITOR IN LONDON.

London, England, July 30, 1909.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—We have had trials and tribulations ever since we came here, and I never saw such mechanics as they have here. It takes them forever-and-a-day to do nothing, and after being here six weeks, we have finally got our exhibit in shape, and it is a great relief to me, for up to the present time I have had no time I could call my own.

The weather has been detestable and we have not averaged one pleasant day a week since we arrived. We are all sick and disgusted with the whole place and I only wish I was going to sail for New York to-morrow. I would be the happiest man in all London. Our lectures are proving a big attraction at Earl's Court and have received some fine press notices in the different papers. I enclose copy of a letter from an artist here, and he says our slides are away ahead of any he has ever seen before. The verdict is the same all along the line.

It was our desire to get some colored slides of London, and we went to Walter Tyler Co. They advise us to take the negatives home and have the work done there, as they could not give us any that would compare with ours.

The picture business is in rather an unsettled condition at present, owing to the fact that the L. C. C. are about to bring out some new regulations which will make a big change in the whole business.

I have had several people from the L. C. C. out to look over my outfit, and they were much pleased with the Motiograph and its work and consider it the best machine in London, but owing to the difference in price, compared with the home machines, it will be a hard proposition to sell them here, but I am in hopes to put two out next week.

I envy you your nice hot weather and wish we could swap some of ours with you.

The London season is about over now and things are a trifle dull, but it doesn't make much difference to us.

Yours very truly,

F. W. SWETT.

Dear Sir—As a season ticket holder and visitor to Earl's Court for many years, I must express my appreciation of the magnificent exhibition of pictures representing California and the Golden West which you are conducting this season. It is by far the most interesting exhibit in the building and must leave a lasting impression on those who visit same, in particular the younger section of the public who have thoughts of emigrating.

For my part, I shall certainly tell my several friends to visit you, and I most sincerely trust that your efforts so well put forward in the interest of those you are representing will reap the benefit anticipated in every way.

As an artist myself I must admit a finer sample of colored pictures I have never seen placed upon a screen.

Again wishing you all success, believe me,

Yours very truly,

THE INDIAN RUNNER'S ROMANCE.—A thrilling episode in the Black Hills. It was about the year of 1867 when gold was discovered in the Black Hills, and the Sioux Indians were at the time possessors of that territory and most of the land was unknown to the white man. Lo, the poor Indian. Little did they know what wealth laid buried in those mountains, and later when they found they had exchanged fabulous fortune for a mere pittance to conniving whites, they became confirmed misanthropes. That is why it is assumed that the Indian is unemotional—they are simply reticent and wary. At the time of our story an old miner, more venturesome than others, secretly worked a claim, and found it rich with deposits. His age, however, conspired against his being able to withstand the hardships he was necessarily subjected to, and Blue Cloud, the Indian Runner, discovers him dying in the rocks. Grateful for the kindness of the brave, the miner tells him of the location of his hidden mine as he dies. Three cowboys come up and want to know the mine's location, but the Indian refuses to tell. Blue Cloud loves the little squaw, and in consequence of his newly acquired wealth, presses his suit in that quaint Indian fashion, wooing with the blanket, symbolizing protection. He is accepted and approved by her father after leaving his offerings outside the parental tepee. Married, they proceed to Blue Cloud's wigwam, and while he is away hunting three cowboys come up and try to get from her the mine's location. She is obdurate, however, so they abduct her to force her to divulge its whereabouts. Finding her still adamant in determination, the renegades gamble as to who shall take care of her, the holder of the high card to have her. Meanwhile the Indian has returned, and finding his squaw gone, realizes the true nature of the situation at finding the sombrero of one of the cowboys in the tepee. Starting in pursuit, he tries to borrow a horse, but is refused, so resorts to running capability to overtake the hounds. The one whose lot it is to take charge of the girl has brutally bound and thrown her across his horse and mounting in the saddle starts for his shack at breakneck speed. Blue Cloud, however, with his knowledge of the trails, by a short cut, and a thrilling dash through the dangerous rapids of the mountain stream, manages to overtake him. Leaping up on the fast galloping horse behind the cowboy, a most exciting combat ensues—a bowie-knife conflict on the back of the horse, with the prostrate form of the squaw flung across its neck. On they gallop, the Indian fighting furiously until at length the cowboy drops lifeless from the saddle. Drawing the horse up, the Indian dismounts and releases the terror-stricken squaw, whom he takes tenderly back to his wigwam. Length, 994 feet.

THE SEVENTH DAY.—The story of this subject was inspired by a decision some time ago in the Cook County (Ill.) County Court, where a Daniel had come to judgment! Yea, a Daniel! Solomon, with all his wisdom, never more agreeably settled a most perplexing question. The impending woe was induced all on account of society, as Mrs. Herne's social obligations were so impelling as to cause her to neglect her home and her children. So seldom were the two little tots—a boy and a girl—in the company of their mother that they felt an unnatural reserve in her presence. Entreaties and prayers from her husband to give up her mode of living induce her to start an action for divorce, charging incompatibility of temper. This step amazes Herne, but the worst blow is her desire to keep the children, a mother's right. The reasons for her wanting to keep the children are simply pecuniary. Of course, the little ones prefer their papa, having always enjoyed his care, but there's the cold, unsympathetic law to consider. This is the question brought before our modern Solomon when Mr. and Mrs. Herne enter the office of the juror. The law is plain to him, but his judicatory experience has not blunted the humane phase of his nature, so he decides that the children's wishes shall be considered. Therefore he orders that Mrs. Herne shall have the children for seven days, and if at the end of that period she has won their love she may retain them. What a long lonesome week it was for Herne, deprived of his darlings. On the other hand, the poor children are grieving for papa, being left alone with the maid, Mrs. Herne still keeping in the social whirl. However, on the seventh day, the maid meets with an accident, which forces the mother to remain at home and take care of the children. At first the task is most odious, but their cute antics and caressing advances win her heart, and she enters into the sport of their play, so that when the hour appointed for her to meet her husband at the court office arrives, we find her still at play with the babies while her husband waits impatiently with the judge. The court clerk is dispatched to find the reason for her tardiness. He sees, and rushes back to inform the judge. Together they go to Mrs. Herne and the sight that greets them obliterates all thoughts of a separation. Husband's and wife's hearts are drawn together by the tiny hands of the babies. Length, 693 feet.

"OH, UNCLE!"—Zeke Wright, a wealthy old batch, has intimated his intention of making his two nephews his heirs, and having nothing but time on his hands, takes it into his head to visit his nephew Tom, who is married and settled. Tom and his wife are goodies, no doubt, and the gay old chap is soon disgusted ,so he decides to pull up stakes and visit Harry Wright, whom he thinks unmarried, not having been apprised of his romantic elopement and marriage. So he sends Harry a note, to wit: "Am disgusted with your cousin's wife. If you ever marry I'll cut you off. Am coming to visit you to-morrow." Holy smoke! Up against it for fair. Well, wits work, and Bessie plays the maid for the time being, but Foxy Nunky is wise and starts a persistent flirtation, much to the perturbation of Harry, who is at length forced to divulge. However, Uncle exclaimed: "Harry, you're all right and I'll double your allowance." So Nunky prolonged his stay with the Wrights. Length, 292 feet.

EDISON MANUFACTURING CO.

A SIMPLE HOME DINNER.—"The Simple Home Dinner" humorously depicts the vicissitudes that attend love's young dream in that respect. We see the two "Newly-Weds" so bewitched by the sight of the pretty little kitchen in their newly furnished apartments that they decide to forget Sherry's and similar places of gastronomic interest and cook their own dinner. What a temptation of fate on the one hand! What sublime confidence on the other! We who know better, who perhaps have lived through a similar experience, smile broadly when we gaze upon the formidable proportions of the hill of fare they contemplate and realize the difficulties that confront them. In their blissful ignorance they begin preparations for the repast. Hubby is despatched to the nearest market and returns laden with bundles. Meanwhile wifey mixes a mess of dough, incidentally consigning sundry dishes of rice and a few other nondescript concoctions to the oven and emptying a pound or two of coffee into a pot of gigantic proportions. And here the real comedy begins, and our smiles give way to laughter long and loud when we see them wrestling with the problem of how to dispose of the lobster, which to their dismay is ALIVE; of the shell oysters, which are so unkind as not to open voluntarily; and of what to do with or where to put the seemingly endless expansion of rice that wifey removes from the oven. During the progress of their panic a gradual transformation of the little kitchen takes place, and at the end we see it littered with bundles, everything on the stove burning or boiling over, and the "Newlyweds" disheveled and sticky with flour and dough —in short, a scene of the wildest confusion where order reigned a short time before. Length, 220 feet.

FAR FROM THE MAD'DING CROWD.—The day is the hottest on record. Our bachelor hero, with all possible means of securing relief and comfort at his command, is sweltering in the seclusion of his luxurious apartments. Fuming and fretting, he keeps his distracted valet on the jump to devise new means of relief. Relief comes with the morning mail. The enticing "Hillcrest" prospectus catches his eye and rivets his attention. Visions of purling brooks and quiet nooks in sheltered glades are conjured up by his imagination. It takes but a moment to decide. Orders are given, trunks are packed, and our fat hero is whirled away towards the Promised Land. Arriving at the station he is met by the landlord, a typical "rube," who piles him and his numerous trunks into a ramshackle rig and they start for "Hillcrest." His sad disillusionment dates from the moment that fearful trip begins. Over dusty roads filled with countless "thank-you-marms" that are responsible for a number of extremely comical breakdowns, they at last reach their destination, which furnishes the second chapter of his disillusionment. His adventures in the Summer boarding country are portrayed by laughable scenes of a 6 x 8 bedroom under the skylight, of an encounter at the stile with two old maids, of the fall on the hill, of the ludicrous swing accident, not to speak of the depressing hammock incident or the fall into the brook while fishing. One by one the visions created by reading the attractively worded prospectus are shattered and our dispirited hero longs for a return to the city, and "the mad'ding crowd." Length, 780 feet.

THE WEB OF FATE.—An episode of the French Revolution, 1792. In the troublous days of the French Revolution the members of the patriotic party called Girondists were subjects of special persecution. This picture shows the pursuit and escape of a young adherent of that party, who takes refuge with the remnant of his sweetheart's family and is hidden by the young lady in the granary loft in the Chateau Le Tour, which has been partially ruined during the progress of the revolution. The chateau is in possession of soldiers of the Convention when our young hero, who has been slightly wounded, arrives. He makes his presence known by a note thrown through a window into the girl's room and, despite the danger of discovery, she admits him by way of the main court, which is crowded with drunken and sleeping soldiers, and conceals him in the granary loft. When the searching party in pursuit of him arrives the chateau is ransacked and, to the young lady's terror and dismay, his hiding place is finally reached. In the meantime, however, while the search has been going on, a busy spider has spun a web across the door to the granary loft. When the captain of the searching party reaches the door and starts to open it he discovers this web and, taking it for conclusive evidence that the door has long been closed and that the refugee consequently could not be hidden behind it, abandons the search and dismisses the entire party. Length, 395 feet.

THE WRIGHT BROTHERS' AEROPLANE. Government tests at Fort Myer, Va., July, 1909. Rare indeed are scientific achievements that compare with the results of the official tests with the Wright Brothers' aeroplane, just concluded at Washington. It was by special arrangement that the Edison Company obtained the exclusive privilege of photographing these tests for motion pictures, and this privilege was granted only after considerable negotiation. The rise of the huge "bird of the air," and its successive swoops as it circles its course over the broad parade ground, the evident interest and excitement of the assembled spectators, are all reproduced with the fidelity of the camera, the films portraying both flights being remarkably clear and distinct. Length, 600 feet.

A CHILD OF THE FOREST.—The opening scene shows an Indian squaw carrying her sick papoose down the trail to the bank of a stream where she bathes its feverish brow with the cooling water. Despairing of its life, she determines to seek the white man's medicine in the nearby village. Pushing her way into the little mission chapel as the mass is being recited, she lays her papoose at the feet of the priest who, mistaking her gestures, baptizes it. Satisfied that the child has received the white man's medicine, she departs and her gratitude knows no bounds when the child recovers. An emigrant train, crossing the plains a dozen or more years later, camps not far from the shores of the stream from which the daughter of one of the party is seen filling a pail with water, unconscious of the stealthy approach of a canoe containing Indian braves. She is overpowered, tied hand and foot and brought to the Indian village, where a council of war decides that her fate shall be death at the stake on the morrow. And here is repaid the debt of gratitude that an Indian is said never to forget. The squaw, whose papoose was spared to her through the good offices of the white man, as she thought, and who has grown to be a fine lad, takes a handkerchief from the captive, and placing it in the lad's moccasin, bids him carry it to the captive's friends. Stealing from the village, Uray, the "Child of the Forest," sets off at top speed in the direction indicated to him. By the aid of the camera we see him climbing precipitous cliffs and picking his wearying footsteps through treacherous swamps. His leg injured by a fall, he presses on, imbued with but one thought—his duty. Coming to the edge of a lake, Uray hesitates only long enough to get his bearings, then plunges in and swims across with long, graceful strokes. Reaching the opposite shore, he falls exhausted, rises and falls again—and again drags himself to his feet and continues his weary journey, finally reaching the emigrants' camp, where, after delivering his message, he swoons. The campers and cowboys mount in haste, and by hard riding reach the Indian village before the captive is put to the stake. After a sharp fight the Indians are routed and the captive, together with the friendly squaw, brought back to camp. Length, 970 feet.

THE PATIENCE OF MISS JOB.—"The Patience of Miss Job" is a short history of the conquest of the traditional bad boy by a little teacher in a Sunday-school who, seeing beneath the surface, realized that within the bad boy beat a good heart and that his transgressions were not due to vicious motives. Her patience was severely taxed, however, when the new scholar was taken to the annual Sunday-school picnic where he lost no time in stirring up trouble. In fact the trouble began before they got to the picnic grounds. The picture shows how he monopolized the swings, stole the big cake, started a fight or two, upset a boat with two of the other children in it, and did a few other things that added to his disgrace. It also shows how narrowly he escaped a merited spanking for each one of these pieces of mischief, how little Miss Job's patience overruled the Superintendent's righteous anger, and how, in the end, that patience reached the boy's heart and made him her friend. Length, 185 feet.

A DASH TO DEATH.—The story deals with the unhappy marriage of a young and beautiful heiress who is forced by her parents to become the bride of an Italian nobleman, a man much older than herself, whose only claim to respectability lies in his lofty title and crumbling castle. Her heart had long since been claimed by a young American of sterling qualities whose advances had been frowned upon by inconsiderate parents. She discovers soon after the marriage that her woman's instinct has not proven false, for the honeymoon is scarcely over before the Duke shows marked indifference, then brutality, and finally, infidelity. The news of his outrageous conduct is communicated by the daughter in a cablegram to her father, who in his distraction turns for aid to the man whose suit had been rejected in favor of the titled scamp. The American immediately volunteers to investigate and sails for Naples, arriving at the villa at a very opportune moment when the Duke, confronted by his wife with glaring evidence of infidelity, is in the act of striking her a brutal blow in the face. Needless to say a quarrel immediately ensues between the Italian and the American, ending in a terrific fight in which the Italian is badly worsted. In pain and rage at his failure to overcome his antagonist, the Duke tries foully to stab the American, and, fearing the results of his cowardly act, flees in terror from the villa with the Americau in pursuit. Gaining the outer gate, the Duke jumps into his auto and dashes down the road, secure in the belief that he has escaped the heavy hand of the Americau. His pursuer manages to secure the services of a passing auto and is soon hot in pursuit. Aud here ensues a sensational and thrilling automobile chase. Up and down hill and around sharp curves with unslackened speed the heavy machines are driven, the American gaining on the Duke with every turn of the wheels. The distance between the two is rapidly closing up, the tense expression on the Duke's terror-stricken features in marked contrast to the triumphant mien of his pursuer. The speed limit of both machines has been reached and hut a few yards separate them when, in turning a sharp curve on the very edge of a steep cliff, the Italian loses control of his machine which crashes through the guard fence before he can jump to safety. A moment it pauses on the brink of that dizzy height, aud then, turning completely over, plunges down, smashing, crashing toward the rocky bottom 300 feet below! Half way dowu the great car strikes a projecting rock—the boiler bursts with a terrific explosion—the gasoline tank ignites and bursts into flame—aud thus it goes plunging down, with its human freight obscured hy the volume of smoke and flame, until it reaches the bottom, where it lies an unrecognizahle mass of smoking wood, iron and rubber. Length, 815 feet.

ON ANOTHER MAN'S PASS.—Rupert Montgomery Featherstone, a retired actor, so the story goes, while picking his way tediously along the sunhaked cedar ties of the Great Eastern Railroad, observed at the side of the track a silk hat, a Prince Albert coat and a leather purse, the property, no doubt, of some careless passenger on the flying limited which had just passed him. Opening the purse he found a railroad pass, issued to that honorable dignitary, the president of the Great Easteru, on whose property he was then trespassing. Rupert Montgomery Featherstone thought for a moment. He recalled that at one time he had found a purse containiug $7,000.00, the property of one Hiram Rich, a Wall street millionaire. Rupert had returned the purse to its owner, expecting to be nobly rewarded for his honesty, but on the contrary had received merely a glazed smile and an icy "thank you" from the magnate, who indicated the door of the outer reception room and returned to his stock reports. Since that time Rupert had heen averse to returning such properties as he found in public places, aud as he now slipped iuto the snugly fitting "Prince Albert" and donned the silk hat, he resolved also to avail himself of the railroad magnate's pass. He hastened to the nearest station and waited for a train. The train arrived and he boarded it. A suspicious conductor called for his ticket, examined the pass, stiffened perceptibly, forced a smile on his couutenance and rang for two porters. There followed a brief whispered consultation between the conductor and the porters and the conductor again approached Rupert. "I beg your pardon, sir," he said, "but your stateroom is in the rear. I shall have it made ready for you, and in the meantime, if you desire, you may have dinner." Rupert rose hastily. "This way," said the conductor. During the repast that followed, Rupert occasionally pinched himself to make sure he was not dreaming. Two stalwart blacks fanned him and served him champagne. After he had lighted a perfect Havana perfecto, he asked to be couducted to his stateroom. Arrived there he expressed a desire to have a shave, manicure and shoe shine, apologizing for his appearance, explaining that he had been spending a few days in his Summer camp. After his toilet was made and he had settled himself for another comfortable half hour in Havana, a messenger begged admittance and handed to Rupert a large parcel, containing some bulky packages of greenbacks. Let us leave Rupert for a moment and step aboard the "Flying Limited," where our friend the hona fide president of the Great Eastern, seated in an uncomfortable day coach, on a little private inspection of his road, reads his paper, unmindful of having lost his coat and hat out the window. The conductor approached him and asked for his ticket, not recognizing him as the "alimghty boss." Discovering the loss of his coat, the president tries to explain. The conductor smiled blandly and rang for a porter. The train was stopped and the president of the Great Eastern was unceremoniously ejected from the train, 14 miles form the nearest station. By this time Rupert, the adventurous, had arrived at a large city, the terminal of the Great Eastern, where were located its main offices. Rupert longed for more gay life and stepped into a swell cafe, next door to the station. He ordered champagne for the house and as he raised the glass to his lips a Salvation Army lass approached him and extended her tambourine. Rupert nonchalantly placed a few hundred dollars on the goat skin and became engaged in conversation with the winsome little lass. She finally won him over and he confessed the finding of the money. She urged him to return it to the president and Rupert resolved to do so. The next morning Rupert called on the president of the road. The president fumed for a moment, then laughed as he noted beneath the rough exterior of the man before him honest, hungering ambition, so he called up his superintendent and told him to find a place in his office for R. M. Featherstone, which the superintendent did. It is needless to say that our hero in due time wedded the little Salvation lass who had saved him and who helped him to the position of superintendent of the Great Eastern Railroad and that they are living and will live happily ever afterward. THE CONSPIRATORS.—An incident of a South American revolution, tells a story of the tragic ending of a love intrigue between the beautiful young wife and the private secretary of Gen. Maeto, the president of the little South Americau republic of Domencio. A member of the lowest class and possessing little education, Gen. Maeto has by sheer force of character made himself dictator of his turbulent little country. A year before the time of our story he married the young orphan daughter of an old comrade. His private secretary is a young Domencion of noble family. These two young people, thrown together in a dangerously close intimacy, have grown to care for each other. Of this the President, absorbed in affairs of state, has not a suspicion.

Scene I. President Maeto, His Wife and Secretary.—The picture opens with au early morning view of the front entrance to official residence of the President. The carriage is driving up to carry him to his official capitol, for like all inhabitants of warm climates the President rises early in order to transact most of his business before the heat of the day becomes excessive. Down the steps comes President Maeto, accompanied by his wife and private secretary. The President kisses his wife and bids her good-bye. The secretary starts to follow him, when he stops him with a gesture. He knows no reason why the secretary should go to the capitol. Better stay and keep his wife company while he is away. He takes the portfolio from the secretary and entering the carriage is driven away. The two young people left alone, watch the carriage out of sight. They glance about to see that no prying eyes are watching them. Then their guilty lips meet in a kiss.

Scene II. The Revolutionist Petition Refused.

Scene III. President Maeto Condemned to Death.

Scene IV. The Warning.

Scene V. The Secretary Escapes.

Scene VI. Retribution—Secretary Mistaken for the President.—At the large public gate leading to the President's home the conspirator, Miguel, disguised as an old man, is waiting. Here comes the carriage. As it passes him he steps forward, draws his revolver, pulls the trigger and stopping only to remove his disguise dashes away. Out through the carriage door falls the secretary. Hearing the shot two servants come rushing up. They lift him out, hut he falls back lifeless into their arms. They start toward the house, one rushing ahead to tell the President. Down the path comes the President. He kneels over the body of the secretary he has loved then stands back in silent grief. Now the wife arrives and falling over the lifeless body pours out her love in broken sobs. The President stands amazed as the truth slowly comes to him, then with a cry of anguish he drops his head between his arms, while his body trembles with his suffering.

THE DYSPEPTIC AND HIS DOUBLE.—Scene I. Dobson, the Millionaire Dyspeptic.—In the opening scene we find Dobson cross as a bear pacing up and down his garden suffering from an attack of dyspepsia. His valet enters and offers aid hut Dohson refuses and finally dismisses him with a kick. Now Dr. Bunyon arrives. He forces the unwilling patient to show his tongue, then listens to his heart and finally writes a preseription saying all he needs is exercise. The doctor opens his valise and taking out a pair of dumb bells proceeds to give a practical illustration of what he wants Dobson to do. Now off comes his patient's coat and the dumb bells are in Dohson's hands and he is forced to clumsily follow the doctor's movements. Next the doctor forces his unwilling patient to indulge in a short Marathon. But Dohson, unused to such violent exercise, soon sinks down exhausted and the spry little doctor as he helps him up explains the wonder of his method of exercise.

Scene II. Dobson Meets Hungry Hank, His Double.—The next morning we see Hungry Hank just awakening from a night's rest in his luxuriant quarters in an old corn bin. He slowly stretches himself, puts on his coat and lighting his pipe starts out in search of the breakfast that he knows awaits him somewhere. At the millionaire's home we find Dohson out in the garden, his coat off, his book of instructions before him, trying awkwardly to follow the doctor's directions. His valet arrives with a delicious young chicken for his master's breakfast. He helps Dobson on with his coat and as soon as Dohson is seated starts to serve the breakfast. But Dobson orders him away crossly. Dobson takes a bite of chicken, then angry because he cannot enjoy it seizes the entire chicken and throws it on the ground. Just then Hungry Hank, who has come up the walk, appears and seeing his breakfast sailing through the air to his feet, seizes it and begins to devour it. He and Dobson see each other and are amazed at the resemblance. Seeing Hank's enjoyment of the chicken puts a brilliant idea into Dobson's head. Why can't he change places with Hank for a short time and get an appetite like that? He proposes it to Hank. Hank agrees and into the house they go to make the change.

Scene III. Dobson and Hank Change Places—Arrested.—The valet returning and finding Dohson gone is busy clearing the table when Dohson's niece enters and asks where her uncle is. At that moment out of the house comes Dohson dressed in Hank'a rags and closely following is Hank arrayed in Dobson's clothes. Dobson starts toward his niece when she screams in terror and the valet interferes. Dobson tries to tell of his plan and again goes to greet his niece, when much to his amazement and in spite of his protests, he is seized by Hank and thrown down the path. Hank orders the valet to follow the supposed tramp while he consoles his niece (?) in her fright. At the gate Dohson and the valet are fighting when a policeman arrives. He hears the valet's story aud leads Dohson away to the police station.

Scene IV. On the Stone Pile—Discharged.—This is a view of the stone pile where the city's vagrants are sent to work out their short prison sentences when arrested. Through the yard come a gang of prisoners, Dobson at the head of the line. Ten days have elapsed since Dohson was arrested. With blistering hand and aching limbs he struggles to do the manual labor he is so unaccustomed to. Several times he stops only to be roughly ordered to work again by the guard. Another guard arrives with an order for the release of Prisoner No. 13. Dobson eagerly tells them that is his number and is led away. After changing his prison garb for his old tramp suit, he is led outside the walls and released. Stopping only to vow vengeance against Hungry Hank, he starts for his home.

Scene V. Home Again, Cured.—Meanwhile back at the millionaire's home Hungry Hank has been having the time of his life. The valet and the niece are both wondering how Dobson ever recovered such an appetite and also such a good disposition at the same time. And now they leave him to enjoy his meal. Scarcely has he taken one mouthful when vengeance arrives in the form of the outraged Dohson. Throwing Hank to the ground he is soon on top of him. The niece and valet come running at the noise. Dohson is pulled off the trembling Hank. Now Dobson tells his niece the truth and compels Hank to again change coats with him. Then he orders the valet to put Hank off the place. Just then his eyes fall on the delicious lunch set for Hank. In a second he is seated enjoying his first real meal for ten days. Now Dr. Bunyon arrives with more rules for exercise, hut Dobson waves him away, and exclaims, "Never again."

TOO GENTLEMANLY.—A man of wealth, having met with great financial reverses after being crowded very closely hy his creditors, finally has all of his furniture seized for the debts, hut he still retains his polished manner. In spite of his adversity even the draymen who move his belongings from his room are nicely treated. Very shortly it becomes necessary for him to seek a means of income. Upon his first application for employment the manager to whom he first applies does not consider that so fine an appearing man needs a field for work so will not consider him for a place. Through all his searching for work his progress is marked by his wonderful courtesy, amounting to a very ludicrous element, as he is clothed in tatters and has the manners of a lord. Finally he secures a menial position at the postoffice. Here his extreme niceness to ladies takes too much of the time he should be at work. This at last leads to the loss of his means of livelihood. He next is seen at work unloading a car of plaster In a quarry. Here, after each sack which he handles, he carefully brushes all his clothes. In a very short time this opportunity for work is lost. The many abuses to which he suhmits because of his gentlemanly nature form material for an immense amount of wholesome comedy that is actually rich in laughs. After trying positions of various kinds and failing to meet with any success in any of them because he is too gentlemanly, he at last has the good fortune to meet an old associate who offers him a situation as a servant. This he accepts with great happiness, at the same time resolving to be more assertive of his own rights in the future. The final and most laughter provoking scene shows us his strenuous manner of dealing with the other servants of the household when they attempt to use him as an object of their jokes. Length, 510 feet.

THE FROCK COAT.—The play opens in the home of a poor family In England. The head of the house, the father, is without work, and searching in vain for a means to provide a decent living for his little family. The wife is ill, leaving the care of the house to a little daughter, the older of their two children. As the little girl takes her brother to his school she sees, posted in a conspicuous place, a placard advertising for a man to fill a place as secretary. This announcement she carries to her father. He fears it will be too aristocratic a position for him because of his ragged appearance. However, the need of his little family is so great that no chance can be missed so he answers the advertisement. He is informed that his recommendations are satisfactory, while his qualifications are excellent, but his dress is not correct—a frock coat and a silk hat being necessary. In order to obtain these pieces of clothing he is forced to sell a large part of his furniture, even to one of the beds. We next see him, clothed in his new attire, at work in the office of his employer. Then we watch him at lunch during the noon hour, bothered by the workmen because of his fancy clothes. After his lunch, as he rests in a public park awaiting his return to the factory, the same workmen are seen near him visiting gayly with some girls. Noting the object of their jests at the restaurant, they, entirely in a spirit of mischief, creep to the bench upon which the poor gentleman sits in the garb which has cost him so dearly and has been the means of securing his work. They cut one of the skirts from his long coat. Through the illness of the poor wife, who appears while he is bewailing the loss of his only uniform, the workmen find the condition of poverty in which he has been living, and forthwith repair the damage they have done by securing new apparel, which they present with profuse apology. Length, 500 feet.

BROKEN TIES.—The story without words unfolds, with every inch of film, a strikingly lifelike set of episodes in the life of a divorced couple, until they are finally brought together again through the instrumentality of their little son. After witnessing the sad parting in the court room following the trial at which the husband, because the wife has been at fault, is granted the care of the child, we are shown a series of touching views of the child in his home. His lonesomeness for his mother and the failure of his father to interest him by gifts, or care or love, and the father's great pain because of his son's unhappiness, make a telling appeal for the uplifting of home ideals and treasuring of domestic contentment. The child seems utterly unable to grow accustomed to the new situation, even after a considerable length of time, so the father arranges to have the mother and child visit one another occasionally at the home of the boy's maternal grandmother. A few meetings but serve to make the separation more painful to both. The grandmother attempts to bring about a reconciliation between the man and wife but fails. The wife grows frantic in her loneliness and decides to steal the child. Upon their next meeting she spirits the child away from the father, who immediately lodges complaint with the police. Soon, accompanied by officers, he arrives at her home to regain possession of his son. The boy is produced forthwith, but shows such reluctance to leave his mother and such genuine love for her that when she adds her plea for forgiveness to the child's entreaty for the company he has so longed for, the father is touched, the mother pardoned, and the family reunited. Length, 777 feet.

SEVRES PORCELAIN.—Several unique specimens of highly ornamented porcelain are shown in series. In each case the various pieces of ware are in reality formed of living people. After a short time has been allowed for admiration of each article, it disintegrates into the individual models, who pose in various figures and dances. In the following pictures are seen a powder box, a clock, candle sticks, a loving cup and a vase, all of wonderfully ornate design, beautifully colored. Length, 194 feet.

A GENEROUS EMPEROR.—Depicting an incident in the life of Napoleon Bonaparte and illustrating his trait of generosity. The play opens in the drawing room of the mansion in which the "Man of Destiny" is making his headquarters. A young officer, who is on guard, is trying to keep awake as he watches over the great commander. To pass the time he writes. The words of his letter are shown to us upon the screen. It reads: "My Dear Mother—I sent you yesterday, all my pay, keeping nothing for myself except a Napoleon. I am very sorry to know that my sister and you are in need. To-night I have the very great honor of being on guard near my Emperor. Great love to you. From George." As he is perusing his work, overcome by fatigue, he falls asleep in his chair. Very soon the Emperor enters the room and finds his guard asleep at his post. He approaches him quietly, sees the letter and reads it. Moved by the kindness of the youth, the great soldier secures from his coffers a quantity of gold which he places upon the letter. He then betakes himself from the room. Now the young officer awakes. Scarcely able to believe his eyes, he finds the money and is mystified to know from where it came. The Emperor again enters, and after thoroughly frightening the young man for his having fallen asleep while on guard, he tells him to keep the money and to add to his letter the following postscript: "The Emperor Napoleon salutes you, madam, and compliments you upon your son. From this time the Lieutenant George will be Captain of the Guard." He signs his name and refuses the young man the privilege of thanking him. Length, 304 feet.

THE HORSE AND THE HAYSTACK.—Mr. Brown and his family, who are spending the holidays at a seaside resort, decide for one day's entertainment, to drive along the shores. Forthwith a pony cart is secured and they merrily go on their way, passing numerous interesting scenes before they arrive at a bathing beach which attracts them so greatly that they leave their pony cart outfit near a stack of hay while they disport themselves in the ocean. While they are giving a very humorous exhibition in the water, the pony is busily engaged in eating his way through the stack. As the stack diminishes the animal grows until when the party are ready to return their pony has grown to be a large horse. As they proceed upon their journey they find the large animal has no trouble to manage his route without regard to their directions in any way. They are led through many exciting experiences, including a most laugh-provoking ride at full speed through a deep forest, whirling about among the trees in a perfectly amazing manner. The horse finally manages to break the harness and liberates himself, leaving the unfortunate Brown family to pull their carriage back to their home. Length, 297

GREAT EVENT AT PODUNK.—There is great merry-making in the village on account of the unveiling of a statue which has been presented by a man in a distant city as a mark of his regard for the town of his childhood. The style of the statue is not known to most of the townsmen. Thereby originates the humor of the play. The crowd, gathered about the veiled group, are awaiting the arrival of a state officer who is to make the dedicatory oration. Two sightseers who are late, as they approach, have the ill fortune to step upon electric wires which are exposed near the scene of festivities. They are temporarily petrified as is also a policeman who chances to touch one of them with his club. Promptly the crowd is transferred from the ground of the actual dedication to the group of living people, bound by electricity to remain perfectly motionless for a time at least. While officers are 'phoning to the power house to have the current closed off in that neighborhood, the orator arrives and proceeds to deliver an eloquent speech. His burst of oratory is interruped when the current is cut off and the group regains its power to move. The comedy ends in a general turmoil in which the actual statue is overturned and ruined. Length, 357 feet.

PATHE FRERES.

ROVER TURNS SANTA CLAUS.—Christmas time comes around, but in this poverty-stricken home it brings no hope of good cheer, for the poor people have barely enough to buy scant food without entertaining the idea of purchasing toys to make the hearts of their little children happy. The good parents feel the disappointment keenly, and their grief is accelerated when the little ones hang up their stockings near the fireplace, with the hope that Santa Claus will pay them a visit during the night. The little family are tucked away in their beds, and Rover falls asleep before the fireplace. The old dog realizes that there is a grave disappointment in store for the little ones in the morning, and with the intelligence of a man, he steals from the house and runs down the street to a toy store, where he is successful in stealing a lot of pretty little articles. He makes several trips, carrying his merchandise each time into the house and laying it in front of the mantle, after which he tucks himself up and falls asleep to wait for morning to come and bring good cheer to his little friends. The youngsters are up bright and early, and there, to their astonishment, find that Santa Clause had not forgotten them, and when the good parents discover the lot of presents, they realize who the Santa Claus really was, and the best is none too good for him. Length, 417 feet.

GETTING EVEN WITH EVERYBODY.—A young tradesman, who is in love with a pretty servant girl in one of the places where he delivers provisions, finds that he has a rival in his little game of love, and the latter is none other than the man of the house. The old fellow, whose wife is insanely jealous of him, never misses an opportunity to force his attentions upon the girl, although she will have none of him and manages to keep the old pest at a safe distance. One day, however, the young fellow becomes suspicious that there is more than an ordinary amount of affection existing between his lady love and her employer, for while visiting her he is shocked when the old fellow steals away from his wife and comes to pay a little visit to the maid. The youth steals out of the room and hastens to inform the lady of the house of her husband's unbecoming conduct. The lady is loath to believe that her husband is unfaithful to her, but upon coming up to the room he finds him on his knees pouring forth words of love to the much-amused maiden. The wife, feeling that the girl is to blame, attacks her, while the two men make a hasty exit, leaving the women to settle their little affair undisturbed. Length, 541 feet.

DANCES OF VARIOUS COUNTRIES. Every country in the world, whether civilized or savage, has the distinction of being identified by their own particular form of dancing. A great amount of trouble and skill has been put forth in securing the different portions of this unique picture and bringing together in one film the scenes and dances of various people from all points of the globe. It is a picture well worth seeing, not alone for its merits as an entertaining subject, but for the educational advantages which can be gained. The picture is made up of scenes and dances from the following races: Brittany, China, Caucasian, Soudan, Japan, Cairo, Austria, Bulgaria, French Soudan, Spain and Mozambique. Length, 482 feet.

THE HAT JUGGLER.—This picture is a reproduction of a clever vaudeville act, and the numerous astonishing tricks are perfectly legitimate inasmuch as the ingenuity of trick photography is in no way an aid to the clever juggler who performs some wonderful tricks in full view of the audience. We see the performer, who is a genius in his art, enter upon the stage and proceed to remove his gloves and coat while he balances his silk hat on the tip of his nose. He next does some extremely difficult tricks with a number of coins, which he throws in the air, catching them on his forehead, after which he lets them slide into the socket of his eye, holding them like so many monocles. He then releases them one by one, letting them fall into his hand. Finally he concludes his performance by juggling three hats, catching them upon his head without a miss. Length, 377 feet.

THE ETERNAL ROMANCE.—A pretty maiden is seen picking wild flowers in the woods, when she is approached by a dashing young Hussar, who stops to talk with her and impress upon the young girl's mind the fact that he is desperately in love with her. The youth then accepts a little wild flower from the happy maiden's hand as a token of her love, and as he rides away he promises his lady love that he will call soon to ask her father's consent to their marriage. True to his word, the young man calls at his sweetheart's home where he is graciously received by the happy maiden. The young lovers are in earnest conversation and the youth is making love to his fair one, when, to their surprise, the old father walks into the room. Horrified at the state of affairs, and shocked at the effrontery of the young man in daring to make love to his daughter without her father's consent, the indignant old man, after severely upbraiding the young lovers, takes his daughter to another room where he locks her up. Not to be outwitted by the exacting old fellow, the tactful young soldier steals over to the door of the chamber where his ladylove is a prisoner, and receives instructions from her. The youth then climbs out through a window and walks along the coping to the prisoner's room, where he enters unseen. After securing a sheet, which he ties around the girl's waist, the gallant lover lowers her to the ground. Everything bids fair for a real romantic elopement, but just as the young couple are about to flee they are caught in the act by the young lady's father. After denouncing the young soldier, and ordering him never to again come near his house, the old fellow again makes a prisoner of his beautiful daughter. The next scene takes place thirty years later, and as all things shape themselves in the course of time, it is not a surprising coincident that the children of those disappointed lovers should fall in love with each other. After that eventful night the unhappy lovers never met again. The young woman in time forgets her first love and becomes the wife of another man, while the young Hussar marries another girl. Forgetting how her life was made miserable by the obdurance of her father, this same woman whose daughter is in love with the son of her old sweetheart, strongly objects to the match and grossly refuses to give her consent to their marriage. The young man, who is greatly disappointed over the sad state of affairs, comes to his father, whom he asks to intercede for him. The latter goes to the home of his old fiance, and after bringing before her mind the circumstances of their sad disappointment, he softens her heart and she gives her consent to the marriage. Length, 771 feet.

TENNESSEE GUARDS.—This interesting picture shows a small guard of colored soldiers being put through a drill, and the fine showing that they make is indeed commendable. One feature of their manoeuvres is the clever way in which they scale a high wall. It shows how easy and with what agility the men in time of trouble could conquer a fort or scale a high wall in escaping the enemy. Length, 207 feet.

MANUFACTURING BAMBOO HATS.—This great industry which is carried on in India, making it one of the leading enterprises of that country, is extremely interesting to note through the medium of the motion picture. We see the bamboo growing in prodigious quantities, and when it reaches a certain height, is cut down by the natives, who sort and carry it to the plant where it is dried. Next we see the stripping, and preparing for the manufacturing of the hats, which resemble our Panamas in many respects. When the hats are finished they are spread out in the sun to dry, and it is an interesting sight to see a large field entirely covered with them. They are gathered up in large bundles and prepared to ship to foreign ports. Length, 443 feet.

A BILLPOSTER'S TRIALS.—A man engaged in the task of defacing the artistic beauty of the town by displaying unsightly posters, comes to a fence where he pastes up an advertisement of a boxing bout. As soon as it is in place the figures on the poster suddenly come to life and, stepping from their places, they proceed to give the old fellow a beating. When he turns around they have disappeared and he sees nothing but the figures on the fence. Next he puts up a picture of a woman in the act of beating a carpet, and this subject also becomes animated, and after giving the billposter a thrashing, she resumes her place in the picture. He then puts up a man playing a hose on a lawn, and when this one comes to life the unfortunate fellow gets a thorough drenching. Disheartened, the unlucky billposter leaves the spot and starts down the street, only to be set upon by a lot of unruly boys, who try to make his life unbearable for a while. The enraged fellow grabs the paste brush and starts in pursuit of the boys, but they manage to evade him and turn a corner quickly. As the old fellow turns the same corner, he runs into two policemen, and in his excitement he slaps them each square in the face with the brush. Covered with paste, the cops rush the offender to the station while the mischievous boys enjoy the funny situation. Length, 426 feet.

A ROYAL OUTCAST.—Our picture story is told in the pretty environment of mythical Arcady, in the time of the timorous King Francis the First, of hated memory. Like all kings of a timid and vacillating turn of mind, Francis was surrounded by bad courtiers, who, taking advantage of his failings, caused no end of trouble to the king's subjects by furthering schemes for their own advancement. Francis had no children of his own and the heir apparent, the infant Clarence, being only a nephew, other relatives were intriguing against his interest to get control of the throne. Amongst them was a rascally duke. As our story opens, we see the duke receive a letter from one of his satellites, telling him to hasten to the Cardinal with an order of arrest against the infant Clarence. The King convinced by the Duke's adherents that the relatives of the heir apparent intended to dethrone him has played into the Duke's hands by issuing the order. A servant of Clarence's father overhears the plot, and rushing to his master's castle with the news, causes great excitement. The parents realize that if their child once falls into the hands of the Duke his life is lost, so they plan to save him by strategy. Like all castles in Arcady, this one has a secret passage leading to a subterranean chamber, which in turn opens upon the bank of a river through a huge stone door, which door opens only to the touch of a secret spring. The Cardinal, the Duke and their retainers arrive to take possession of the child, but the infant Clarence is not to be found—we have seen him placed in a chest in a large dark closet; the bottom of the chest opens and lowers the child gently into the waiting arms of the old servant who first gave the alarm, the stone door swings open disclosing the river; the mother before parting with the child has pinned a small purse of gold and a note to its clothing, for the servant does not know to what expedient he may have to resort in order to save the child's life. It proves to be a wise precaution, for after gaining the river bank, the servant discovers he is pursued, and knowing that discovery means death to the child, places his charge in an open boat and sends it adrift, then returns to confront his captors. Their tortures fail to compel him to betray his young master and the poor man returns to the castle to relate to the grief-stricken parents the story of what he was forced to do in order to save his charge. "The Next Day" two peasants are walking on the river bank; the man is lame, the woman is young, rugged and strong. She calls the man's attention to a richly decorated gondola that is floating unguided down the stream. "Look, Hans. Don't you see a child's face nestling against the cushions? Listen to its cry." "An infant? Mary of Mercy, so it is. I'll go for help." "No ,you watch our baskets. I can swim and I'll soon bring it to shore." In spite of her lame husband's feeble protests, she plunges into the stream, and we witness the rescue of Clarence. He is taken to the peasants' hut; the gold and the mother's appeal are found; the peasant mother has a babe of her own. "We'll keep him as a playmate to little Lesa," and so the royal outcast receives a peasant's welcome, share and share alike. Only the very poor understand charity. "Seven Years Later" the peasants are at Leydey, the capital of Arcady, selling vegetables. The mother reads a placard on the castle wall. "5,000 golden florins for the recovery of the infant Clarence, cast adrift in an open boat seven years ago, in the hope of saving him from political enemies." "See, Hans, they mean our adopted boy; I don't want their money—the child belongs to me. Come." The children are quickly placed in a two-wheeled donkey cart and the family make for their peasant home, but the faithful servant of the house of Clarence has seen their agitation upon reading the placard, and he quickly imparts his discovery to the boy's parents. They, accompanied by a mounted retinue of retainers, start in pursuit. "At the Peasants' Home" we see mother and child reunited, then the triumphal return of Clarence to his princely castle. The King Francis dies, the Duke who plotted Clarence's death is banished, and the royal outcast comes into his own, is crowned King of Arcardy, and the peasant family who succored him are given good positions at his court, and all ends happily, as all tales which teach the inevitable triumph of virtue and honesty over vice and villainy should end. Length, 1,000 feet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(George Kleine.)

THE KING'S PROTEGE (Art Film).—A story of France in the days of that artful and superstitious monarch, Louis the Eleventh, showing in powerful manner his last hours, haunted by ghosts of the victims of his cruel and tyrannical reign and harassed by the coalition of the nobles of Burgundy and Brittany.

The play opens in the oratory of the king where, sleeping upon his luxurious couch, he is haunted by frightful nightmares. In his dreams he sees the nobles, whom he has sent to the hangman, returned to life, and entering his bedchamber, attacking him as he sleeps.

The terrified ruler summons his attendants, whom he orders to bring to him his godchild, the only person in his empire able to dispel his fears and bring him happiness.

In the next scene, the royal party, garbed in rich raiment, proceed through the streets of the quaint old city of Paris. They are surrounded by onlookers and interrupted often by mendicants who receive coins from their lord.

Now a herald brings to the king a scroll which announces the arrest of a conspirator. Immediately Louis, following his usual manner of dealing with his enemies, orders the execution of the offender. Almost as he signs the writ of death a vision like unto his dreams appears. Filled with gloomy forebodings, troubled in heart, he returns to the palace, where, accompanied by his hermit, he visits the dungeon of the prisoner, who is recognized as a dignitary of court. To his pleading for life and mercy no heed is given by the nerve-wracked master of France. Even as he gloats over the agony of his captive, another vision comes before his eyes, driving him into such turmoil of soul that he seeks refuge in his chamber, where he soon falls into a restless slumber while his godchild's sweetheart is on duty as guard of the castle.

The guard's lover comes to him, then as they are wrapped in conversation, an armed assassin, seizing the opportunity, enters the castle, proceeds to the apartment of the king, whom he is about to strike, when discovered and secured by menials of the palace.

Greatly enraged, Louis dispatches soldiers in search of the neglectful guard. He is found tete-a-tete with the maiden. Both are brought into His Majesty's presence. He orders their arrest and is so overcome by his conflicting emotions of love for his godchild and rage at their thoughtlessness that he is seized with an apoplectic stroke. Once more the terrible visions appear before the dying monarch. With a last supreme effort he stretches his arms towards the godchild, imploring her help. She goes to him, winning his mind from the vision. As it disappears, he commands the release of the prisoners, gives them his blessing and passes away. Length, 647 feet.

Very interesting, depicting wonderful scenic display from the summit of Victoria Peak, as well as the scenes along the tramway railroad, which runs directly up this mountain, which is 2,000 feet in height.

LIBERTY FOR AN HOUR.—This pathetic drama opens in a prison cell where a convict sits meditating over his lot. His thoughts are interrupted by the entrance of the guard who orders him out to work. In the corner of the jail yard, masons are repairing the wall. As the guard on top of the wall turns his back, the prisoner cautiously climbs a ladder, leaps over and runs away. His break for liberty is observed, the guards fire upon him, and failing to stop his flight, call their comrades and start in pursuit. The convict eludes his pursuers for some time, comes to a field of daisies, where he staggers and falls exhausted. Hearing a noise he jumps up, ready to continue the journey or defend himself, when to his surprise he sees a little girl coming towards him picking daisies. She comes forward unhesitatingly, gives him some of the flowers, then sits down and talks to him. A few moments later he hears a noise, this time unmistakably that of his pursuers. He jumps up and is off. A moment later the guards appear, beat about the field and brush, then proceed on their way. Meanwhile the little child wanders on, comes to a stream, jumps into a boat to cross to the other side, when of a sudden the boat topples over and she falls into the stream. Her cries for help are heard by the convict, who emerges from the bushes, sees the girl struggling, plunges in and brings her safely to shore. The guards also have heard the child's cries and appear at the bank just as the convict with his little burden reaches the shore. The prisoner is taken back to his cell, where we find him sitting on his cot fondling the daisies given him by the innocent child whom he rescued in his short hour of liberty. Length, 355 feet.

THE JUDGE'S WHISKERS.—In their dining room a judge and his wife finish breakfast, put on their hats and coats and leave the house, the judge going to court, and his wife shopping. The gentleman comes to a barber shop, enters, sits in a chair and gives instructions about trimming his whiskers. He falls asleep while the barber is preparing his tools, and unfortunately at this time a messenger enters with a note for the barber. He must hurry away at once, so calls his assistant to finish the job. Instead of trimming the whiskers the assistant removes them entirely and gives the judge a clean shave. He wakes up at the finish, is furious at his altered appearance, rushes angrily from the shop and starts for home. The wife during her shopping tour has been annoyed by the attentions of a masher. She hurries home and when hubby appears she mistakes him for her tormenter, and with the help of the maid gives him a good beating. She then leaves a note for her husband, telling of her experience; that she is afraid to remain alone and has consequently gone to her mother's. The judge immediately goes there and meets with the same reception as he did at his own home. He endeavors to establish his identity, is again unsuccessful and leaves the house. On the street a sign reading: "Magic Hair Restorer—grows hair in a night" meets his eye. He buys a bottle, goes home and applies it freely to his face. In his sleep we are given a view of the judge with his whiskers growing out in profusion. When he wakes up he is overjoyed, trims his whiskers in the same style as he wore before the accident, then rushes to his wife. In her mother's parlor the family is assembled as the judge enters, tells his story and is freely forgiven. Length, 591 feet.

THE WAY OF THE CROSS.—A story of ancient Rome. The scene of this story is laid in Rome in the days of Nero. Rome has recently suffered conflagrations and other disasters, and Nero, hoping to divert the public wrath from his own misconduct, has encouraged the persecution of the growing sect of Christians. Valerius, the hero of the story, is a young Roman officer of a better nature than the people with whom he is thrown in contact. Leah, the heroine, is a beautiful young woman, and one of the leading spirits of a band of Christians. In the opening scene of the picture we see Leah, the heroine, and the Christian band being roughly treated by the mob in the streets of Rome. The scene then changes to the interior of a Roman house where the hero, Valerius, and a number of loose Roman men and women are drinking and gambling. Valerius is thoughtful and becomes disgusted with the life he is leading. He leaves the scene of dissipation in spite of the protests of Gallia, a courtesan, who is in love with him, and goes into the street where for the first time he sees Leah, the Christian girl, and hears the story of Christ. As he listens in wonder to the new religion, and is looking with admiration on Leah, the mob suddenly becomes uncontrolled, beats down the Christians and would have injured the girl, Leah, except for the timely intervention of Valerius, who saves her from violence and leads her in safety to her own door. In the meantime Gallia, who has come into the street, with jealousy has observed Valerius' admiration for the Christian girl, sends a spy to learn where she lives. Returning from the home of Leah, Valerius goes to the palace of Nero, whither the jealous Gallia and others have preceded him. Arrived at the feast he is taunted by the revelers concerning the new found object of his affection. Gallia induces Nero to have Leah brought to the feast, where she is unexpectedly confronted by Valerius. The revelers torment and taunt the girl until the hero takes matters in his own hand and steps forward to protect her. He throws aside the chief of her tormenters and leads her into another room. Here he makes love to her, but, resenting this, she gains his respect, begs him to leave his life of dissipation and the worship of idols, and to follow her in the "Way of the Cross." Valerius is impressed by her words, and for the second time gives her safe conduct to her home. The following day the jealous Gallia persuades Nero to sign a decree of death upon all Christians and she induces a certain Captain to start upon immediate execution of the decree. The hero, however, suspects that her purpose is to secure the death of the Christian girl and carries a personal warning to her home. With her father and younger brother she escapes to one of the subterranean chambers in the vicinity of Rome. Here with other Christians she remains in hiding for some time. Finally, however, it becomes necessary to send the younger brother, Paulus, from the hiding place for food. As he goes through the streets of Rome he is discovered by Gallia and is captured, tortured and compelled to reveal the hiding place of the Christians. The soldiers set out at once to capture Leah and her band. The hero, however, has gone to the cliffs where the Christians are in hiding to seek an interview with the Chirstian girl. As he leaves her he spies the soldiers coming to take the Christians. He follows them into the cavern and for the second time saves the life of the heroine, compelling them to give her a fair trial. She is brought before Nero, and, in spite of the hero's protestations that she leave her religion, acknowledge the idolatrous religion of the Romans and join him in safety, she clings to her faith and as a reward is condemned to die the death of a martyr. The hero is in despair. The scene of the story now changes to the arena on the day

THE INDIAN RUNNER'S ROMANCE

A THRILLING EPISODE IN THE BLACK HILLS.

The unprecedented success of our Indian subject, "The Mended Lute," has assured us that this film will undoubtedly create the biggest sensation of any moving picture production ever issued. The scenes are laid in the Black Hills at a little later date than our other subject, and tell a romantic story of an Indian runner. An old miner, who has been secretly working a claim, succumbs to the hardships, and is attended in his last hours by the Indian, to whom he reveals the whereabouts of his hidden mine. The Indian's squaw is abducted by a party of cowboys, who hope to force her to divulge the location of the mine. There is a most thrilling pursuit of the renegades by the Indian, who, after many exciting incidents, overtakes the cowboy who carries the squaw on his horse. Leaping up behind him, a conflict ensues between them, astride the same horse, with the squaw, bound hands and feet, lying across the animal's neck. The Indian is victor.

THE SEVENTH DAY

A film story founded upon a decision in the Cook County (Ill.) Circuit Court. The mother of two young children yields to the fascination of the social whirl to such an extent as to entirely neglect the home and young ones. Her husband at length rebels and a separation is imminent, she wishing to retain the children merely for pecuniary reasons. The judge reserves decision in this manner: "Take the children; win their love in seven days, then you may keep them; otherwise——" Well, the children not only win the mother over, but induce a reconciliation between the parents.

Our young friends, Harry and Bessie Wright, are apprised of a visit from Harry's Uncle Zeke, in the following epistle: "Am disgusted with your cousin's wife. If you ever marry, I'll cut you off. Am coming to visit you to-morrow." Here is trouble. Nuaky doesn't know Harry is married, and so Bessie is induced to play the part of the maid. Foxy Uncle is wise, and causes Harry many pangs of jealousy by blatantly flirting with the supposed housemaid. However, Uncle Zeke is very favorably impressed with Bessie, and Harry has nothing to fear from a revision of Uncle's instrument of bequest.

following. The Roman populace is on the way to attend the gladiatorial combats and the execution of the condemned Christians. This sort of spectacle evidently does not appeal to Valerius, but urged on by Gallia he consents to join the audience at the arena. After a combat in which the cruelty of the Roman populace is shown, the Christians about to die are led before Nero's private box, where the hero is seated. Among the Christians as they pass the box Valerius again beholds Leah, the Christian girl. She looks up to him and as her last message holds up the cross. At this Valerius rushes from the crowd and goes down into the prison and struggles with his own mind as to where his duty and happiness lie. In a series of visions he sees the Christian girl pointing him to the Way of the Cross, and sees Gallia, the courtesant, holding out her arms to him. This vision fades and again he sees before him the cross. Leah is led past him to her cell to await the moment of execution. He follows her and pleads with her at the last moment to renounce her belief. She, however, is true to her faith, and Valerius, his conscience now thoroughly aroused, sees before him only one path, the "Way of the Cross." As he sees this inevitable course, the guards throw open the doors once more. The lions which are to devour the Christians are seen moving about beyond. The guard gives an order and Valerius and the Christian girl holding aloft the cross, pass out into the arena to meet death together. Length, 990 feet.

PEACEFUL JONES (A Western Drama).—William Jones, a poor young Eastern lawyer, goes to Arizona to grow up with the country. He arrives at Red Dog and puts up at the Palace Hotel. The proprietor of the Palace has a pretty daughter, Belle, well named, as very man in the country is in love with her. Belle likes Jones largely because of his quiet, amiable manner, which wins for him the nickname of "Peaceful" Jones. But when "Ugly Bill," a rival, strikes Jones with a whip and Jones fails to resent the insult, the girl calls Jones a coward and refuses to speak to him. Later a delegation of cowboys wait on "Peaceful" at his cabin and offer him a pistol with which to fight it out with "Ugly Bill." Jones refuses to fight, saying, "I am a peaceful man." The cowboys shove a rail under Jones and "ride" him out of town. A band of Indians out for trouble encounter the cowboys, fire on them, and a battle follows. The cowboys "drop" a number of the redskins, but three of their own number are wounded, and they draw lots to see who shall go for assistance. "Ugly Bill" is selected, and he has hardly started before he is shot. Now is "Peaceful Jones'" chance to show his real mettle. He rescues Bill, takes Bill's revolver and goes out through the deadly passage for help. After two terrific hand-to-hand fights with the Indians, Jones comes up with a company of Uncle Sam's soldiers, who are engaged in signal practice. A word to the lieutenant, and the soldiers dash to the rescue, and they come up just in time. Their ammunition gone, every man wounded, the cowboys are making their last stand. Just as the Indians dash toward them, the soldiers come up, led by "Peaceful" Jones. Two volleys from our gallant soldier boys drive the Indians up the cliff, leaving behind them their chief and ten warriors with passes for the "Happy Hunting Grounds." And now that he has time to think of himself, "Peaceful" Jones remarks quietly: "Boys, I guess I was hit." and the goodhearted fellow falls upon the ground. The soldiers pick up Jones and the wounded cowboys and carry them to the fort. A month passes, and Jones is the central figure at a celebration over his recovery. "Ugly Bill" is chairman, and he voices the sentiment of Red Dog when he says, "Peaceful, you're the best man in town." Then Bill leads the girl down to Jones and leaves them in each other's arms.

NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE CO.

SECRET SERVICE WOMAN.—This picture starts by showing several officers examining a counterfeit bill, and also Miss Keene (the Secret Service woman), who is detailed to find the counterfeiters. She shadows Stubbs to a store and later to a large house on the outskirts of the town, to which Stubbs gains admittance. Miss Keene then disguises herself as a country girl and returns to the house, where she is admitted by a woman and instructed as to her duties. Upon her leaving the room, the chief counterfeiter and Stubbs enter and go over matters with the chief's wife. The Secret Service woman behind a screen watches, and sees the man place a quantity of bills in the valise, and hears the directions given to Stubbs. When Stubbs is left alone, Miss Keene is seen dusting and is made love to by Stubbs. He then takes up satchel and leaves, Miss Keene following after. We next see the female detective enter an old building through a cellar chute, where she finds Stubbs drinking. While under this influence he goes to a trunk and in it places the valise and also plates used in making money, and then falls across the table. She then secures the valise and plates and disappears. The chief enters, and finding Stubbs asleep shows anger. He looks for bills and plates and not finding them pulls Stubbs to his feet. He does not believe that Stubbs knows nothing of their disappearance, and ties him to a post, leaving him for five minutes to decide to tell where they are. Miss Keene then enters and releases the much Surprised Stubbs, donning his hat and coat, which completely hides her dress, and telling him to go. Miss Keene pulls the ropes about her as though she were tied. The chief then returns and as she is about to make him prisoner, Stubbs sneaks in and fells her to the ground. They tie her and compel her to disclose where the plates are hidden. The chief secures them and leaves with Stubbs. After struggling to free herself, she makes her escape through the chute. She overhears all their plans and follows them to the dock, where she enters as a newsboy and hides beneath a barrel. While the chief is helping his wife into the launch, he places the valise on the ground. Miss Keene succeeds in hiding it under the barrel with her. He discovers its loss when Stubbs gives warning of police, and they hasten to the launch. They are caught, however, handcuffed and taken prisoners. The next and final scene shows Miss Keene, the Secret Service woman, receiving congratulations for successfully tracking the notorious band of counterfeiters. Length, 1,000 feet.

I have had to turn down quite a good deal of business in my new office in New York because I wasn't in shape to handle it in the typical Laemmle style. But now I'm in bully shape, with nothing but new stuff and plenty of it. I am going to take care of all applicants in the order of their applications and give them the hottest little film service you ever dreamed of. The rest of my offices are making a dandy showing in spite of the weather and are setting a pace that is delighting my customers. Start with a Laemmle service now and you won't have to worry about the summer season.

Box Ball Doubles the Profits of Your Theatre

$800 a Month With No Expense But Rent!

Moving picture shows pay out big money every week for employes, song slides and film rental. But Box Ball is a business that often brings in $200 in six days, yet has absolutely no expense but rent. One customer with four alleys took in $1,845.20 in 59 days.

Customers who spend only five cents in the theatre spend more than a dollar at Box Ball. Crowds are quickly fascinated with this new game. They never tire—the more they play the more they want to keep on playing. No one wants to quit loser, so he plays game after game—often spending hours when he first intended to spend a few minutes.

When the crowds are in your theatre give them free tickets for the first game. Every one will play at least once and many will become regular customers. Women and children play as well as men—they form teams and clubs and often spend a whole afternoon or evening.

Install one of these money-making games in connection with your theatre. Rent the room above or get the store next door. Put in two or more alleys and you will be simply amazed at the wonderful profits.

Your only expense will be rent. Players set the pins with a lever and the balls are automatically returned. One man to collect the money is all you need, and he can care for as many as ten alleys.

One game usually lasts six minutes with two players. At 5 cents each that's $1.00 an hour from every alley—you can figure the profit yourself. With ten hours' play two alleys will bring you $20 a day, or $120 every six days.

Send for our free booklet and learn how you can own one of these great money-making games for only a few dollars down and the balance payable from your profits. Remember—you pay just a few dollars down, and your profits the very first month should more than pay the entire cost of the outfit. Write for booklet at once. Address

THE HUNCHBACK

A thrilling dramatic story of the dog-like devotion of a hunchback to his benefactress, who rescues him from the stocks and his evil ways and brings out the innate nobility of his nature. She almost becomes the victim of a libertine's plot for her downfall, but is rescued by the faithful hunchback, who bears her home, though in the rescue he has received his death-thrust from the sword of the rake's accomplice. He carries his senseless burden until assured of her safety, then falls lifeless at her feet. LENGTH, 633 FEET.

NIAGARA IN WINTER DRESS

A splendid scenic subject, taken last Winter, and showing the commencement of the ice pack that was one of the most disastrous in the history of the river. No detail has been overlooked by the skilled operator, who has produced a noteworthy series of panoramic views that are almost as realistic as a personal visit to the scene. The falls, the gorge and the rapids are shown in interesting series. LENGTH 350 FEET.

THE GALLEY SLAVE

The first of the "Films de luxe" of incidents from Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables." A most pretentious and artistic reproduction of the visit of the convict, Jean Valjean, to the Bishop, whose courteous hospitality he repays with the theft of his silverware. Valjean is apprehended by the police on suspicion and taken before the Bishop, who denies the theft, declaring that he gave the convict the silver and reminding him of two massive silver candlesticks which he overlooked. The magnanimity of the Bishop so impresses the convict that his heart is softened and he kneels in unfamiliar prayer. This is a production practically perfect from every point of view. Producer, actors, scenic artists, operators and finishers have united to produce a film notable in every respect. The narrative is graphic and clearly told in a series of charming landscapes and convincing interiors. The interest is caught from the moment that the starving man steals a loaf of bread for his suffering family and held until the final tableau. One of a series of five incidents, the story is complete in itself. LENGTH, 885 FEET.

Editorial.

Injunction Granted in Favor of the Pennsylvania Exhibitors.

The information received that the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company has been granted an injunction in their suit against the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, restraining the factory inspector from enforcing the "three feet aisle law," fully endorses our editorial of last week. We congratulate the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company and the exhibitors in whose behalf they have led the fight with but little encouragement.

Some theatrical papers and moving picture trade circulars printed last week a malicious letter from the secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Pennsylvania, reviling the representative of The Moving Picture World for telling the truth in regard to the meetings of that Association. As these papers had no representative at these meetings and were in ignorance of the facts, their printing of Mr. Miller's letter was an abuse of journalism which has been generally condemned. We also received the secretary's letter for publication but withheld it as its sentiments were so at variance with Mr. Miller's attitude when he called at our office that we "smelt a rat," if we may so express it. Mr. Miller, who called as an exhibitor and not as an official of the Association, corroborated the report of our representative, Mr. Bradlet, and they both left this office together, seemingly in perfect accord. Just as we go to press we are in receipt of a letter from the president of the Association in which he states his regrets that the letter should have been given out for publication and assuring us that it was not the official order of the Association. The Moving Picture World endorses Mr. Bradlet's report of the meeting, all the more so as we know that his personal sympathies were with the exhibitors who were trying to get together to protect themselves. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Pennsylvania also has the sympathy and support of this paper, but only if it has the general unanimity of all exhibitors and exchanges, because otherwise its object is futile.

The Modern Moving Picture Theatre.

Practical Hints for Progressive Exhibitors.

INTRODUCTION.

Which is the best way to successfully conduct a moving picture theater? The answer to our question is clear. It is: To give the public what it wants. And what does the public want? An equally obvious answer presents itself: The best. The best pictures, shown amidst the best possible surroundings and under the best circumstances and conditions. The formula we are giving is a simple one. Whenever and wherever it is applied the public responds with remunerative recognition, and success results. But if the formula is not applied, then failure, if not certain, is courted.

These are ordinary business platitudes. In an ordinary business, a business of established lineage and one the nature of which the public has been for years familiar with, such platitudes would be almost impertinent, and certainly inadmissible. To tell an ordinary tradesman or manufacturer in the columns of his trade journal how best to conduct his business: to read him, as it were, the alphabet of that business, would be absurd. He has long since passed beyond the elementary stage of his profession, which, being a settled thing, is governed by settled rules and regulations quite as well understood by the public as well as by himself. He and the public see "eye to eye." They progress in parallel lines.

Not so the moving picture business. It is new; and those engaged in it are also new. Ten years ago, five years ago, there was no moving picture business to speak of. There were few manufacturers, few renters, few theaters, and no public worth speaking of. All four sections that go to make up a huge homogeneous industry have grown into large and visible being within a few hundred days. There are numerous manufacturers, hundreds of renters, thousands of theaters, millions of the paying—and each of these four sections is growing. At the time of writing, the relations between the manufacturers and the renters and between the renters and the exhibitors are assuming—if even they have not finally assumed—a definite and final shape; the relations between the exhibitors and the public are less definite; are, in fact, inchoate and evolutionary; and that is why we have projected this series of articles.

In plain words, the exhibitor, except in isolated cases, is not giving the public of his best. The public at large has got wise to the possibilities, to the performances, to the merits, the charm, the unending novelty and absorbing interest of the moving picture as a means of entertainment and instruction; and it is dimly conscious, we are convinced from, that the moving picture is not presented with such eclat, such distinction, such decision as it might be. The public has made the moving picture: now it is asking that it shall have the fullest justice done to it: that it shall be placed on a plane of sumptuary treatment not lower than that of the talking stage and other forms of public entertainment. The public demands that the moving picture shall be presented to it in a beautiful, refined, esthetic form, accompanied by all the accessories of culture, good taste, and sensuous adornment. And the moving picture exhibitor is called upon to respond to this demand.

He must beautify and adorn his house externally and internally; he must call to his aid all the arts of the decorator, the painter, the musician, the builder, the printer, the administrator, the advertising expert, the courteous usher, the best of personal help—in short, he must learn how to cater for a class of people growingly intelligent, growingly interested in moving pictures as a staple form of intellectual amusement; he must get down to the elementary needs of a vast and growing business.

It is the object of this series of articles to help him on to success in his work.

Travel Talk and Moving Pictures.

The Fall season, which is shortly about to open, will witness great activity in many branches of the moving picture field. We have repeatedly urged in these columns the value of the moving picture as an aid to the lecturer. Moving picture lectures of travel subjects are by no means unknown to the public, and indeed many of them have received commendation in our pages. Good as some of these entertainments are, we have felt that, excellent as the lectures and the lecturers themselves were, the moving picture end of the business was scarcely done the fullest justice to; in brief, our ideal moving picture lecture had not been reached. What we had in mind was a series of well-chosen, well-photographed moving picture views of the most interesting or most romantic parts of the world—something that would appeal to the imagination of an audience and do duty for foreign travel or extended trips in one's own country.

It is about time that the moving picture lecture finally superseded the old stereopticon lecture. The public has called for it, and we have almost daily evidence here in New York City that such a kind of entertainment, namely, the union of a high class lecture with high class moving pictures, interspersed with good lantern slides, would greatly interest the public at large. Realizing this fact, Mr. R. G. Craerin, the well-known theatrical impresario of Washington, D. C., has entered the moving picture field and will shortly start his Inaugural Season, 1909-1910, with the R. G. Craerin Travel Talks.

These travel talks treat of the show cities of America, namely, Washington, D. C., New York City, Montreal, and Quebec. Mr. Craerin has pointed his moving picture camera to the most salient and interesting characteristics of those great cities. He shows their daily life, their architecture, their scenic and other beauties, points of historic interest, the homes of the wealthy, the ocean liners, business life, modernity, antiquity, history, progress; in short, he has prepared for the mental delectation of the great American public a perfect microcosm of the national life as it is lived in the great cities that he has photographed.

To the series of moving picture films here briefly described Mr. Craerin has added a large number of lantern slides, plain and colored. The series of lectures will be delivered by a high class lecturer who has the gift of placing himself immediately in touch with his audience. Thus this unique moving picture enterprise starts out well equipped for success. We have seen a collection of the R. G. Craerin travel talk moving picture films, and are impressed by their excellence of quality and their sure capability of interesting, entertaining and instructing the many audiences that will see them during the coming Fall and Winter. We welcome the R. G. Craerin travel talks as a moving picture enterprise that deserves the warmest encouragement, and we are confident that wherever the pictures are shown they will be well acclaimed and received. A booklet of the tours can be obtained of R. G. Craerin, incorporated; main office, Washington, D. C.

Let us again point out to managers that an auditorium may be well lighted without detracting from the brilliancy of the picture if the lights are shaded from the screen and the eyes of the spectators. Tinned shades can be used which will also reflect the light downwards where it is necessary and harmless.

Popular Entertainers and Entertainments.

By Rev. H. E. Latham, Eastport, Me.

One of the most popular forms of entertainment of this twentieth century is the moving picture theater. Just how popular and appreciated this institution has become with the majority of people is shown by the fact that during the past twelve months these theaters attracted a daily attendance of over four million persons, or more than a billion persons during the past year.

Nearly fifty-eight millions of dollars are invested in these show houses; and nearly two hundred miles of films are exhibited every day.

As to the character of this form of entertainment and entertainers much can be written in its favor, and a great deal in its praise.

Aside from the low price asked for admission to these theaters, which is a great advantage to the masses that must be entertained, and the length of amusement, which is at the least more than an hour, there are the items of the sense of the beautiful, the dramatic, knowledge and travel.

Any person who is at all familiar with the beauty of the pictures shown, especially those produced by the best American and French manufacturers of films, realizes that their esthetic or artistic appeal to the average person must be for his good. There can be no doubt, either, that one's sense of the harmonious in color forms and relations is educated and developed.

So far as the dramatic is concerned, it is a well-known fact that only the best actors and pantomimists can be or are employed to act the parts and characters on account of the limitations imposed by having to eliminate the voices and personalities of the actors. A person needs only to recall a few of the plays presented within a month at the most of the moving picture theaters, and the names of the authors and actors, to understand how much good is being done along these lines to instruct and amuse the patrons.

We all know that to increase a person's knowledge, and to widen his view of life, is to make him, as a rule, a better neighbor and citizen. When, then, we consider the number of educational films that are shown every day to persons who before never had the opportunity or inclination to learn and know about certain books, stories, historical events, industries and the life of the various nationalities and classes of persons, and in an entertaining and interesting way, we begin to understand why these theaters are so well appreciated and patronized, and how much, too, they are doing along educational lines.

The writer has enjoyed several conversations with different librarians of our public libraries in relation to these theaters, and all have said the demand for certain books, stories and histories had increased whenever any of these educational films had been shown at the various moving picture theaters.

Along with knowledge and education, of course, travel forms a factor. How often we hear the remark, "Travel is a good educator." For those who cannot afford the time or the means to visit all parts of our country, and foreign lands, what better way is there to see and know our country than by the payment of a few dimes, and the expenditure of what otherwise might be wasted hours, in one of these comfortable moving picture theaters, and go, with no tourists' or travel troubles, to the various enchanted scenes of our world beautiful?

We are well within the bounds of truth when we make the statement, that no institution has done so much to popularize and make familiar the scenes and history, not only of our own country, but of all the foreign lands.

The writer knows well that there are some high stepping critics who criticise the morals and suggestions of some of the story and dramatic films. For their benefit we quote from the letters of our best film makers who are sending instructions to their artists and writers: "Murders, suicides and all subjects calculated to excite the morbid instincts we do not want and shall under no consideration accept." Furthermore, the fact is, the worst violaters in relation to morality and suggestiveness, and the morbid and sensual, are not our modern stories and plays, but many of our much vaunted and highly respected classics. Many of the highly honored ancient plays and classics have to be much expurgated and revised before the film makers consent to place them before the public. Up to the present time no theater, so far as the writer knows, has dared to picture Shakespeare's "Merry Wives."

It would be well for some of these captious critics to call to mind these facts, and to remember that even some of the Bible stories, of the Old Testament, have to be expurgated and revised before the maker of films offers them for the moral and religious instruction of their patrons.

The moving picture theater is here as an institution; as a progressive and improving form of entertainment; for it furnishes amusement cheaply; it instructs; it helps people to enlarge the view of life and things, and gives a higher and better form of pleasure to most of its patrons who would naturally be content with a lower. Any institution that does that ought to be popular and appreciated. Meanwhile it is vastly improving its pictures both in form and matter, and like everything else in this good world only the best will be allowed to survive.

DWIGHT MACDONALD RESUMES HIS LAW PRACTICE.

The resignation of Mr. Dwight Macdonald from the position of general manager of the Motion Picture Patents Company, to which reference is made in another part of this week's World, occurs at a time that is convenient to himself and favorable to the future of the company. We are aware that Mr. Macdonald has for a considerable period past entertained the plan of returning to his legal practice, from which he temporarily withdrew in order to devote himself to the organising work of the Patents Company. This work has been so well accomplished that the affairs of that company are in thoroughly good administrative order and the Motion Picture Patents Company therefore enters upon the second stage of its career with every prospect of continued success, a condition of affairs which all Mr. Macdonald's friends will wish him on his return to his William street office.

UNIFORMED ATTENDANTS.

Most well-conducted moving pictures houses have uniformed attendants, who are easily identified by the public; are therefore more readily available as sources of information and guidance, and as a result contribute directly to the success of an exhibition. It is a direct compliment to the public to place these courteous officials in uniform; and we always notice that where this is done the public appreciates the compliment by increasing and maintaining their patronage. We draw the attention of our exhibiting readers to the fact that D. Klein & Bro., of 927 Market street, Philadelphia, specialize in making and supplying special uniforms for moving picture theater attendants, and we advise all interested to get into touch with them and learn how they can be of use to them.

Plain Talks to Theatre Managers and Operators.

F. H. Richardson, Chicago.

CHAPTER XVI.

SLIDE CARRIERS.

There are several forms of slide carriers on the market, the one most in use being the old-style wooden carrier with two sides, or slide compartments. This form of carrier is now made in metal, but it is objectionable from the fact that it gets very hot and is then difficult to handle. Little need be said concerning this carrier except that a small handle should be screwed on the end next the operator so that it can be pulled towards one, instead of having to reach over and shove it from the further end. No matter what kind of carrier you are using, there should be a permanent metal mat attached to the stationary part, the mat being made of size to just fit the stage. You can then throw a flood light without plastering the whole front wall with light, and when, as sometimes happens with certain skirt-dance slides, there is no mat on a slide, it fits the stage or curtain, anyhow. For running song slides with a single lamp the "Ingento" dissolving carrier (Fig. 34), made by Messrs. Burke & James, Chicago, is the best article the writer has seen to date. It does not dissolve, for that is an impossibility with a single lamp, but the effect, when the carrier is properly handled, is the best the writer has seen. It is not the purpose of these articles to advertise anyone's goods, but in some cases the purpose of the series cannot be served without naming specific articles. A very good effect is had, also, by taking a piece of light green Venetian glass, cut in convenient form, and passing it slowly in front of the projection lens, meanwhile moving the carrier. Properly done, the effect is really very nice.

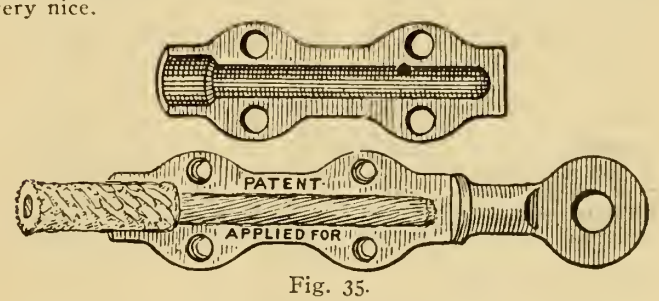

Fig. 35.

Some weeks since I named the Bell wire terminal as excellent for cable ends. Since then samples have been sent me of a terminal (Fig. 35) made by the Robert Webb Electric Co., Pittsburg, Pa., which is perhaps the most substantial of anything on the market. They are made for different sized wires and appear to be an excellent article. Where the machine is not equipped with an automatic shutter there should be a foot shutter. In fact, there should be one anyhow, since the automatic may go back on you, and if there is a foot shutter ready to connect up instantly, you will experience slight inconvenience and delay.

Fig. 36 shows plainly how to make a quick-acting, serviceable foot shutter. The plan, so often followed, of attaching a dinky little foot pedal to the floor, is very bad, since it compels the operator to sit in a cramped position. The writer uses a long bar made from one-inch wood, set on edge about eight inches from the floor. This allows of placing the foot in several positions, which is a decided relief, especially on an all-day's grind. This pedal should be placed about directly under the edge of the machine table and its height from the floor should be according to the height the machine sets. With the machine 3 feet 6 inches from table to floor, the top of the pedal should be 8 inches from the floor when the shutter is down. If a film tank is used in place of a take-up, it will be necessary to attach a flat strip to top of pedal or else set the pedal itself flatwise. The back end is attached by a screw or bolt to something substantial and the front end should slide up and down in a block like A (Fig. 36), attached to the front wall. The bottom of the slot in the block should be so that the pedal will just strike it when the shutter is wide open, thus relieving the strain on the shutter and chain. The shutter should be attached to the pedal by a brass chain such as is used on the flush tanks of water closets. A shutter made as directed will work, and work right, but it will have to be modified when there is a film tank in place of a take-up. It will snap shut the instant the foot is removed. Right here is an excellent illustration of the "sloppy" methods employed in very many operating rooms. The average foot shutter you will find attached to the shutter by a scrap of wire—often two or three pieces of wire patched together. The pedal will be a little piece of board about 4 by 8 inches, attached to the floor by a strap hinge, which, in nine cases out of ten, is partly or wholly loose. Sloppy! sloppy!! sloppy!!! Do things right, or get out and give someone the job who will! One of the first things my father taught me was "if a thing is worth doing at all, it is worth doing well." The longer I live (I am 43 now), the more firmly I am convinced that the old gentleman was absolutely right. The "Oh, that's good enough!" workman is a miserable failure at anything he undertakes, except that he concludes to blow his alleged brains out, and even then he would probably end by mispointing the pistol and merely shooting one ear off instead of making a job of it. The "Oh-that's-good-enough-I'll-do-just-as-little-as-I-can-and-keep-on-the-payroll" man is not an operator, or much of anything else, for that matter, no matter how much he may know. In fact, it is not what you know that counts, but what application you make of your knowledge. To be a real operator you must not only know, but you must also do. Wages are too low, I am well aware, but when the writer gets to the point where he doesn't feel ambitious enough to do his work right, owing to low wages or anything else, he will quit, and he will do it darned sudden, too. There is absolutely no excuse under the heavens for sloppy workmanship.

SOUND EFFECTS.

The Western Gaumont Chronophone Company (recently incorporated) have made a contract with Yerkes & Co. to supply sound effects to their numerous customers in the West. These effects have become so well known that they are to be found in almost every successful moving picture theater. Their absolute realism have made them indispensable. The Yerkes' factory, at 53 West Twenty-eighth street, is working to its capacity turning out these effects. A visit to their rooms will be extremely interesting. Mr. Tommy Gaffy, the original sound effect man of the Manhattan Theater, New York City, now has charge of the demonstrating department of Yerkes & Co. He will make a tour of the country in the near future with a line of Yerkes' sound effects. The foreign moving picture managers are more than anxious to install a line of these sound effects, and it is possible that Mr. Gaffy will take a trip to the other side to demonstrate them before long.

Merrill, Wis.—Chas. Stachle will open a new moving picture theater in the Montgomery Building.

By Arthur S. Newman.

CHAPTER IV.

The camera for taking bioscope pictures has gone through less changes than any of the other pieces of apparatus used in the production of moving pictures. Cameras of almost exactly the same construction as those made ten years ago are now in use, and although small details have been in some cases altered and improved, the same general system obtains to the present day. This may be because the camera was originally constructed in a more perfect manner than was the case with the other apparatus. I feel quite safe in stating that the accuracy of the camera, as first produced, was of a higher standard, and the errors introduced by it, into the complete system, less than those at first inseparable from the other machines.

Neglecting the purely experimental cameras of the first investigators, we may consider that in general manufacture, the camera gained in excellence by the experience and partial failures which the making of projectors brought to the notice of manufacturers; a very large number of projectors having been placed on the market long before the camera became a commercial article. Another item is the fact that the camera is called upon to do very much less work than either the perforator, the printer, or the projector. The single-hole perforator is perhaps the hardest worked of all the machines, as it must prepare all the film required for use, and make a complete cycle in producing each pair of holes. The printer may have to pass the same negative hundreds of times through, making a complete cycle to every four pairs of holes passed; while the projector is called upon to work for some hours each day, making a complete cycle at each picture (or four pairs of holes). The camera—except in the case of stage work—seldom works for half an hour per day, and, luckily for the excellence of the whole process, generally breaks down entirely in the case of derangement.

One of the first points to be considered in a camera is its lightness and portability, and therefore its working parts are usually more delicate than are those of the other machines; as a consequence it must of necessity contain the best of workmanship, and be carefully fitted; it also follows that it is less liable to vibration, its working parts being of no great weight. For convenience of transport it must be portable, and this fact has in no small degree contributed to its careful manufacture and good qualities.

The camera comprises mechanism similar to that of the projector and printer, with the additional fact that it must be light-tight in itself, as it must deal with quantities of sensitive material in any situation. Another advantage making the constructor's task easy, accrues from the fact that the mechanism that is called on to move the film forward intermittently, need not have so rapid a motion as the projector mechanism. It is very seldom that the obliteration period in the camera is less than 50 per cent. of the whole time; in fact, with nearly all cameras now made, it is impossible to devote more than 50 per cent. of the time to the exposure, and in some, so large a proportion can not be reached. Operators, in order to produce sharply defined pictures of rapidly moving objects, usually close the wings of the shutter till the amount of exposure is reduced to about 20 per cent. of the whole time, and it is seldom that cameras with a permissible 50 per cent. of exposure are called upon to exercise it. Such a possibility is sometimes of very great utility, especially in our climate, and in choosing a camera the operators should insist on this quality; or if the moving parts admit of a still larger amount of exposure and it can still be worked at full speed without vibration, the camera having these qualities is to be preferred to one having less wide possibilities. By full speed I mean from 18 to 20 changes per second. The normal rate of 16 changes per second gives good rendering in nearly all cases; still at times, when objects moving rapidly at right angles to the optical axis of the camera require to be photographed, it may be advantageous to increase the speed somewhat beyond the normal rate. There are many other important conditions to be filled in describing a perfect camera, but as these articles only concern the question of accuracy, I shall only deal with the points having definite bearing on the subject. In the first place, the tripod or other support must be above suspicion, many bad results being due to imperfect support. A very slight amount of twist, right and left, is the most common fault introduced by the support. Too short a driving handle on the camera will much accentuate this defect. The result of this can often be detected when the pictures are thrown on the screen, and it can be easily differentiated from other faults when they also exist.

The bottom, or base, of the camera should be thick enough to resist flexure, so that it may be firmly attached to the tripod top. Neglect of this point may allow the bottom board to become slightly rounded permanently, when, unless the tripod top is correspondingly hollow, no stability can be attained. Many cameras have the bottom board so thin that although quite flat, it will bend slightly when the handle is turned to take a picture, and, again, a short handle will increase the defect and the picture on the screen will travel up and down rythmically and in synchronism with the turning of the handle of the camera. This also is a defect in the finished picture often met with, and easily detected. The remedy is simple. It is only necessary to provide three small projections placed symmetrically round the tripod screw, either on the bottom of the camera, or the top of the tripod, and be sure that in screwing the one into the other, too much force (such as might permanently strain the bottom of the camera) is not made use of. The projections in question should form as large a triangle as the tripod top will admit, and the triangle should be as nearly as possible equal sided.

The camera mechanism should run quite easily, and at the first sign of a bind in any of the parts, or stiffness on turning the handle, provided such troubles are not due merely to want of oil, the camera should be sent to the maker for rectification. On the other hand, careful notice should be taken of the particular mechanism which moves the film intermittently, and when wear can be detected by feeling the smallest amount of shake in the bearing or joints of the parts, the maker's attention and refitting are required if good results are to be attained. The sprockets and other gear may wear considerably without affecting accuracy, and the camera become quite noisy in use; but the intermittent mechanism must be kept in first class condition.

I shall not say anything about accurate focussing or accurate placing of the picture on the film in these articles, because I am leaving the optical and chemical side of the subject for treatment in another series, this series being intended to deal only with the mechanical problems. Having stated last week that the average camera was usually well constructed and that it had the right to be considered the most perfect of the four principal instruments, I am now going to condemn one of its appurtenances, the revolving tripod head, as being usually the most unsatisfactory of all the appliances for the production of moving pictures. Having examined many revolving heads, I think I may say that not one passing through my hands could lay claim to thorough smoothness in working, and at the same time freedom from what mechanics call "loss of time." To make a revolving head to combine these two attributes requires the exercise of considerable mechanical skill; not that the problem is a difficult one in itself, but it certainly calls for extreme care, and if made on the present lines, it requires that the last 1-1,000th of an inch should have attention. "Near enough" will not produce good results—nothing can be "near enough," it must be right. How seldom do we see a "panorama" film move steadily across the screen? And, again, how often do we see a succession of jerks, during the most rapid of which all detail is momentarily lost? Now, with a perfectly working revolving head this should not occur. Tripods have to stand a considerable amount of rough usage, and as the head is often permanently fixed to the tripod, it comes in for its share of trouble. The rough usage must not be blamed for all the faults. When these instruments leave the workshop they are often far from satisfactory in action, and as a rule their condition does not improve with use; still, the rough usage they often meet with is frequently to blame for the poorness of the results for which they are responsible. In choosing a revolving head the photographer should note in the first place that the handle turns evenly, not only when at one part of the revolution of the top, but at all parts; and, secondly, that the screw is so well fitted that on reversing the direction of rotation of the handle the top immediately responds to the reverse. Many of the "market" heads will not stand this test, even when quite new. Sometimes it will be found that in one position all is as it should be, while at another, perhaps a half revolution of the handle must be made before the top responds. This loss of time is not in itself detrimental to the immediate results, but it shows lax manufacture, and such a head will sooner develop serious defects than one which will stand the above stated test. For panorama work the head should receive a careful overhauling from time to time, and at all times should be kept free from grit and dirt, and be well oiled. In cases where the head is also fitted with an elevating attachment still more care should be exercised, because should anything become loose, either by wear or injury, much film may be inadvertently spoiled. The tripod should always be examined for side-twist whenever the camera is placed in position, and should any be detected, the legs should be spread wider apart if possible. Many otherwise perfect tripods show a considerable amount of side-twist if the legs are spread over too small a ground space.

We now come to the printer. This is a critical instrument, and has been in the past, and is at the present time, responsible for much of the unsteadiness on the screen. Given perfect perforation, and a good camera, producing a steady negative, a bad printer, or for the matter of that a good one unsuitably treated, may turn out fearfully unsteady pictures. Rotary printers, in which the negative and the film to be printed pass together over a sprocket wheel and are drawn together through a "gate" with a mask or slit exposed to the printing light, are not much in use at the present time. A machine with a "pin" or a "claw" movement seems generally preferred. This is as it should be, and no doubt experience, and a process of trial and errors have done much to discountenance the rotary printer.

The same reason which prevents the sprocket-spacing perforator from being a perfect instrument, causes the rotary perforator to be unreliable, namely, the difficulty and improbability of getting a perfect sprocket and one perfectly mounted. There is another fact with militates against good results in a rotary printer. The film on which the negative is taken generally shrinks somewhat during development and drying, usually about 1-16th of an inch in a foot, and if the positive film has been perforated to the same gauge as the negative film, the gauge of the latter after development will not agree with the former. Both films pass together partly round the sprocket wheel, and the outer one ought to be the longer in gauge. This point has escaped the attention of all the makers of the machines which have passed through my hands.

MOTION PICTURES FOR PUBLICITY.

Chico, August 5.—The Chico Land Investment Company, which has recently acquired the Shippee ranch and other territory, bringing its holdings up to a total of 6,000 acres, has adopted a novel plan of advertising the tract by means of moving pictures. The services of R. S. Edmonson and C. W. Tait have been secured. These men will travel all over the county taking pictures of the varied industries of the county. The films will be placed in the hands of a San Francisco agency and will be shown throughout the East.

ANTIQUES AND BRIC-A-BRACS FOR MOVING PICTURE SETTINGS.

The value of the Moving Picture World as a trade medium is shown in the following letter from a concern that tried a single advertisement a little over a month ago:

"Dear Sirs—Please repeat the advertisement we had in your paper; you still have the cuts, as they have not been received by us. We value highly the assistance your paper has given us in making a new departure in our business. We have had quite a number of inquiries and calls from film manufacturers or their agents which should result in future business. Yours truly, The Genuine Antique Store, S. M. Jacobi, Manager, 34 East Thirtieth street, New York."
